MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find post-office order for $5 for the world trip. Yours truly, T. D. STIMSON,

MANCHESTER, IOWA, May 11, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for $10, the amount we subscribed for that trip round the world. Yours truly, C. W. MEAD & Co.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., May 14, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: Please find $5, as per agreement, for the world trip. Wishing you all the success imaginable, I remain, Yours fraternally,

F. C. JACKSON.

TRIPOLI, IOWA, May 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: To help you "swing around the circle" I herein inclose you the $5.00. D. P. WALLING.

NELSONVILLE, O., May 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Here's $5 for the circumnavigation fund. Stir up well the gods on the other side. If when you strike India you should hav any unoccupied space in your gripsack chuck in a little god in one corner and bring him over to me. I don't suppose any of them amount to much, but still I hav a curiosity to see one of the cusses so much noise has been made about. I wish you a pleasant and prosperous journey, and a safe return home.

Yours truly, A. R. STONEBURNER.

SKANEATELES, May 14, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find postal order for $5, the amount promised you for the round-the-world trip. Your respectfully, JOHN L. MASON.

SILEX, ARK., May 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: At last we hav the word to fork over, so here goes $8—$5 for the O (round) trip, and $3 for my subscription. I glory in seeing you go.

Inclosed also is $5 from H. L. Bailey, of this place, for the trip and books. E. M. JENNINGS.

GARDNER, May 12, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Find inclosed check for eighteen from E. F. Blodgett, Fletcher Blodgett, and A. W. Goodnow—$5 each—for the round-the-world fund, and three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year.

E. F. BLODGETT.

KASSON, IOWA, May 6, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find three dollars to pay my subscription for another year. In the faith of unbelief in heavenly nonsense I am with you.

I see you hav decided to take that big sail. Find a "V" within to help you. G. H. BANCROFT.

GRAND MOUND, IOWA, May 10, 1881.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find eight dollars—three dollars to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year, and five dollars to help you round the world.

LEROY DUTTON.

COUDERSPORT, PA., May 24, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for eight dollars—$5 for your trip around the world, and $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Although rather late, I hope this will reach you before you leave on your journey. And hoping you will hav a pleasant and enjoyable trip, I am, with much respect,

W. W. DUNHAM.

BELLEVILLE, KAN., May 16, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed you will find P. O. order for $21.50; ten dollars for my pledge for two copies of your book of travels around the world; five dollars to credit on account of J. D. Whipple for THE TRUTH SEEKER, also five dollars from J. D. Whipple to help you round the world, and one copy "Infidel Abroad" for balance, to my address,

Yours, etc., DR. H. PATRICK.

LYNN, MASS., May 18, 1881.

Mr. EDITOR: The thought of a round-the-world trip is grand and glorious, full of rich promis, clusters of ripe fruit that will fill many a hungry heart. How intensely we shall watch every mail that brings the true tiding, etc. May heaven speed your journey and bring you safely back to your thousands of friends. Of course I shall hav the books. DR. CORKEN.

CHAMPAGNE, ILL., May 5, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed please find draft for $5.00, for your trip around the world, in return for which please send me the volumes as soon as they are printed. My best wishes go with you. I think I shall sell a number of volumes soon; I will do all I can. I would like to take that trip with you. Sir, you are the right man in the right place. May the great God of nature giv you health and life during your trip, and may you liv to do still more good after your return. You hav my best wishes.

Respectfully, A. SHERMAN.

BALTIMORE, MD., May 19, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you the $5.00. I feel quite sure I shall get more than $5.00 worth in your book, besides helping the cause, and possibly do some good by way of enlightening Christians as to the condition of the heathen. Respectfully,

E. LOVEJOY.

BEAVER DAM, WIS., May 14, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal order for ten dollars to apply toward defraying your expenses on your trip around the world, for which please giv credit to

Yours respectfully, B. THORP,
JOHN CLEM.

WALTON, IND., May 12, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I see you hav decided to make that trip round the globe. Your trip to Europe last year proves your ability to make the trip round the world more interesting and instructiv to the general reader than any antecedent circumnavigator.

Inclosed find pledge of $5, and if you want more cash before you start, or at any time during the trip, let me know and I will send $5 more. I hope that the trip will be attended with vigor, health, and comfort to D. M. Bennett, the man who went to prison through Christian bigotry. Yours, etc.,

E. VAN BUSKIRK.

ON THE WING, May 23, 1881.

MY DEAR BENNETT: Herein please find my $5, and may you liv long and prosper! If you visit Mount Tabor, and see Jesus, will you inquire if he really did talk to Peebles? In your books tell us all about the domestic life of the heathen.

I know two Freethinkers who would be good company for you—Wm. Hart, of Kirksville, Mo., and Dr. Pearce, of Camargo, Illinois. Dr. Pearce is a very wealthy gentlemen. Of course, whoever accompanies you will pay all his own expenses. Mr. Hart is a stanch Freethinker. Both gentlemen are very social and well-read. Your friend, W. F. JAMIESON.

HARTFORD, CONN., May 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I expect to call on you in a few days if nothing happens, and will then hand you my $5 for the world trip. I wish to look you square in the face and giv you one hearty grasp of the hand before you leave, for fear I may never hav the chance again, as it is a long way round this world and many dangers are to be met with; but wish you a safe return, as you are needed home to battle ignorance and superstition. Adieu. D. BODIFIELD.

ROCHESTER, MICH, May 8, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed you will find the formerly pledged five dollars to help you around the world, and I hope and pray the gods of the various localities which you may visit will be propitious to you. I hav no particular fears of any save that Jew God of Palestine, whom you hav so unmercifully held up of late. If he yet retains many of his former characteristics, you will need to keep a sharp eye out or you may "catch a lick" while traveling through the holy land. But nevertheless you'll hav to take the chances. Respectfully, C. H. GREEN.

WELLESLEY, MASS., May 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Nothing more nearly perfect was ever written that the passage in your last week's reply to Mr. Mair in regard to the treatment received by poor old Job at the hands of the two arch-plotters against his comfort. You need hav no fear that it will ever be excelled. I hav never written you in reference to the proposed world trip, because, first, I could not lend a helping hand; second, I would not help to influence you to go and contribute nothing toward the expense of the trip; and third, I hav too much sympathy for Mrs. Bennett to say one word in favor of the trip unless I could offer her some return for her sacrifice. But now that you hav decided to go, I must say that there is no one toward whose expenses I would more gladly contribute than your own. I fear you hav consented to start with too little funds to get the advantages you ought to hav in justice to yourself and the interests your going is intended to promote. I hav no fear that THE TRUTH SEEKER will not be well sustained in your absence. It has come to be altogether too much of a necessity to the Liberals to be allowed to fail.

Ever sincerely to Mrs. Bennett and yourself,

ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON.

NORTHFIELD, MINN., May 11, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find the "V" that was pledged to aid in circumnavigating the globe. I do not see my name among the donors. Our Bennett has forgotten that the cold North produces friends. As the time is drawing near for your departure, my courage fails me to say go Not that we hav any fear for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but what its columns will be as ably filled as when our captain is at the helm. I only fear the angry billows might claim him as their guest. If it were terra firma all the way we would feel more at ease. But if go you will, I will pray for your safe return. You know the good book says, "The prayers of the righteous availeth much," therefore will try and be very righteous while you are on the circuit. My faith in prayer is so very small—much smaller than a grain of mustard seed—I am afraid my beseechings would not penetrate through the ceiling. I'll do my best in the business; I know you won't ask for more.

Would rather substitute another "V"
Than to send our Bennett
Over the dark-blue sea.

Yours truly, MRS. S. J. LENONT.

GALT, ONT., May 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Here are ten dollars more for the pilgrimage. Both are subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and are greatly interested in it—Jas. Brown, Galt, Ont., and Robert Manson, of Ayr. Mr. Brown, who is a warm friend of yours, came here yesterday, and said he had seen my name in the paper, and thought we might send all three at once, but I told him my five was in your hands, but I would forward these to you with great pleasure. He is a veteran in the cause, owns a splendid farm of three hundred acres between Ayr and Galt, and is a celebrated stock-breeder. He does not fancy the pilgrimage, and would prefer to giv you the $5 to remain in the sanctum, but he says he will stick to you as long as you are on the earth. He said to my wife that he expected from you the best book of travels that has ever been published.

Your friend, W. E. RENWICK.

BALTIMORE, MD., May 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your special circular reached me this evening, reminding me of my promis to contribute $5 toward your proposed circumnavigation the globe. I had not forgotten it, but was glad to find in THE TRUTH SEEKER of week before last that you had determined to set out on the journey. I was also glad to hear you announce that so large a number had proffered their aid. I hope now they will promptly fulfil their promises and that still others will come forward and swell the fund, for you will find it will swallow every dollar contributed, that is, by the time you get the book ready for contributors.

I hope that the friends will be prompt, so that you can get off at an early date, and my advice is that you make no start until the whole amount you consider actually needed is at your command. Don't start on promises unfulfilled. I feel, however, that there will be a very general response to your announcement. You must expect a certain percentage of the promises will not come up. People's circumstances change, and people die, etc.

Another suggestion I would make is to not be profuse with minutiæ, as it will take ten volumes instead of two or three. I had hoped before this time to hear that some good brother with ample means of his own had proffered to go with you as a companion, for I think some one ought to go with you provided one congenial could be found. An uncongenial companion is worse than none. You would need one, too, who could "rough it," as you would. I hope you will not meet the fate of Dr. Livingston, and therefore I advise you to keep out of the uncivilized parts of Africa. I think the Herald would not send a Stanley after you. No! they would say, "Let the confounded old Infidel go, for the world is well rid of him." And that's just why I dont want you to get lost or perish on your journey. I want you to get safely back again to keep up that everlasting pounding on the superstitious bigots. I don't want your light to go out just as it is about to assume the greatest effulgence.

Well, go then, and you hav my strong sympathy and hopes for a safe and prosperous journey. Our eyes will follow and be on you all around the globe. You must ever remember that you will hav some one or some hundreds always thinking of you even when you are climbing along the circle of the opposit side of this big ball. Inclosed you will find a "V." Yours truly, C. GARWOOD.

GRANT, PA., May 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been waiting to hear which way it would be. I see by your paper that you are going that journey. I was in hopes you would not go, but since you are going I herewith send you $10, $5 for your journey and $5 as I direct. May good angels watch over you and bring you back sound in body and mind; then I want you to visit each and every state of these United States. I know you will do more good for mankind in such a visit than going round the world. Success to you and yours.

Yours in truth and friendship,
MARY A. SHEPHERD.

HART, MICH., May 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: A long time I hav been watching the result of your proposition to tramp, tramp round the earthly ball, all the time feeling quite anxious as to the result, and as now there is a pretty fair show for your going I inclose $5 to aid you in the undertaking, feeling at the same time that I had rather you would remain at home. But if you must go I want to share in your very liberal offer, etc.

Wishing you great success and an agreeable voyage, I remain Yours etc., C. A. GAINES.

BUFFALO, N. Y., May 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Is there not some Infidel who owns a yacht sixty feet long or larger who would get in cruising trim and take you round the world if he could get a good crew of yachtmen who would pay their own way for the sake of such a good cruise?

If there is, he can count me as one who will pay his own way and a share of the yacht's expenses if not too big a craft. I can take any position on a sixty or seventy-foot craft from captain to (I am not a navigator) foremast hand, except cook. This would be a much more comfortable and pleasant way, and no time would be lost. For instance, while you were exploring the Holy Land we could sail around and meet you in the Persian gulf. If you were a year or two later I think I could furnish the yacht myself. Yours truly, THOMAS PAINE FRANK.

BLACK HAWK, COL., May 16, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I received your kind letter of January 22d, containing copies of your London testimonial and other things, in due time, and thank you ever so much for it. To-day I inclose you $6—$5 for your long trip round the planet and $1 to assist sisters Sara and Elmina in their present troubles with the powers that be. Hoping the promised stamps will soon come in, that your journey will be a pleasant one, and that you will return in the best of health and spirits, I am as ever,

Your true friend, P. B. JOHNSON.

PARK CITY, UTAH, May 16, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed P. O. order for $14.25 to apply as directed. I am pleased to see that you contemplate going round the world. Instead of injuring your health I think it will improve it, and your description of the country will be something we can depend upon. Your letters to THE TRUTH SEEKER will make it doubly interesting. And from what we hav seen, Eugene Macdonald is capable of conducting the paper in your absence. Should you visit in the United States after your trip round the world, you will probably giv us a call at this place, where you would be warmly received. Park City is destined to be rivaled by no mining camp on the coast. The Union Pacific railroad has a branch road here, which makes things very lively.

We welcome THE TRUTH SEEKER, which comes along regularly every week filled with instructiv reading for all that are disposed to put reason in the place of superstition. So be not at all alarmed, for there are plenty of Liberals that will stand by you. I will await the publication of your book with pleasure, which will supersede your "Infidel Abroad."

JAS. G. WATSON.

OTTAWA, ILL., May 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: In behalf of old La Salle I greet you, wishing you a pleasant, successful, safe, and prosperous voyage of discovery. I go the customary $5 to help out the fifth five hundred on the tour of observation and search for truth round the world. Now let the reserve corps move forward and giv the going and coming man a grand Bennett-fit.

Respectfully, N. WOOLSEY.

NETTLETON, MO., May 10, 1881.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: I hasten to comply with my promis to giv substantial aid for the swing round this little earth. I hope you will call on God (the Liberals of the country), and when you get back you will return thanks to God (the Freethinkers) in the shape of one or two nice volumes of your travels.

Inclosed please find $3.50, for which giv T. J. Watson credit, also $5 for the trip round the world. My only wish is that every hour your spend abroad may be "jeweled with a joy." Fraternally,
W. H. SLOANE.

MEMPHIS, MO., May 16, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I will start out to-day to find those who hav promised their "V's" for your trip. Hope you will find some congenial spirit still in the flesh to bear you company. I know there will be numbers of the disembodied with you. I wish you an interesting and instructiv trip and safe return. Ed Butler sends $5 for the trip and $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Stephen Young sends $5. Hope I can add another to-day. Fraternally yours,
STEPHEN YOUNG.

RIDGEWAY, KANSAS, May 18, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I hav been watching the movement in favor of the trip round the world, and now see the prospect is good for money necessary to pay your expenses. I inclose money order for $8—$3 for the paper this year, and $5 for the trip.

I am seventy years old this day, and hav been branded with Infidelity for at least fifty years of the time which I hav lived. I hav raised quite a family, all grown now, and hav a quite a lot of grandchildren, all of the same stripe, sober and industrious, and don't use either whisky or tobacco; but like fun, and will dance and go fishing on Sunday. If I do not liv to get your book, some of them will be likely to get the benefit of it when it comes out.

I am truly your friend, H. H. HABERLING.

YPSILANTI, MICH., May 16, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find postal order for $8. I rejoice that you decide to take the long journey around the world. I think the publication of your views of Bible lands will be of more value to the people of the civilized world, and more truthful than all the false-hearted and designing Christian missionaries ever published. But then, again, I regret that you must leave the management of your paper to other hands less qualified than the editor-general. Without doubt the one you leave will be good, but in an important fight we want the best, and D. M. Bennett is universally acknowledged to outrank any other. I most fervently hope that the journey will be accomplished without accident or a failure of health or strength, and that the affairs of home and the home business will be all that you may desire.

I remain yours for truth, J. W. BABBITT, M.D.

TILLABROOK, OR., May 6, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I will inclose you a postal order for $31, for which you will send the goods as above described, $5 for your trip round the world if you go, and if not I will send for books, and 50 cents for Ingersoll's lithograph. Those books you send on your trip round the world I want morocco-bound and gilt-edged, and I will pay the difference on receipt of the books. I wish you luck and pleasure on your trip. Yours, J. J. MCCOY.

FARLEY, IOWA, May 15, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for the world trip, as per my promis. I am sorry you are going. We shall need your power while you are gone. None can fill your chair on THE TRUTH SEEKER in all departments. Fare you well, old friend.

T. B. Wakeman's address against the Comstock bill at Albany was a grand thing. Tony must hav felt small under the lashing. H. GILMORE.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, May 23, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: So it is decreed that you must leave us. Seems sad to think of. I hesitated a long time before I pledged the five dollars toward this trip round the world. I really did hope more would protest and giv the five dollars toward THE TRUTH SEEKER, and so induce you to stop at home. But as the cause of liberty is the dearest theme of my life, and as you are one of its greatest champions, is the reason I am glad to giv it, and thankful we hav a D. M. Bennett to giv back to us good truths for the little cash we each gave toward the work. With all the godspeeds and prayers that are possible to come from the lips of a God-destroying, church-hating woman, I bid you a happy and successful trip round the world and back home, none the worse for seeing those awful places where God, Moses, and the devil, etc., lived and died. Yours for truth,
MRS. M. LYNDOLL.

NEW BRIDGE, OR., April 19, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $1, for which please giv me credit. I am glad to see the valiant TRUTH SEEKER not only livs, but thrives, and is a better paper than ever before, and long may its editor liv to raze old superstitions and elevate the truth to such a hight as none hav ever dreamed of!

You talk of taking a trip round the world. If you go it will cause a vacancy in the ranks of the Liberals that will be felt throughout the land. But if you intend to make the trip, put my name down as one that will giv five dollars.

Yours for truth forever, M. REEVES.

BURTON, MICH., May 11, 1881.

DEAR BROTHER: As you hav decided

To tramp, tread, sail, and ride
Around the world where we reside,
And giv us knowledge, high and low,
While you're tramping to and fro,

And giv us knowledge of man's customs, his laws, and manners weigh, and as I trust in charitable, just, and nicely-balanced scale, without yellow, blue or green glasses of sectarists who write to sustain some book or special theory; who see Lot's wife in a pillar of salt, who can see no geologic formations in Mount Sinai or Palestine, and west of and near the Dead Sea. Giv us Bennett truth, fact, science, religion, especially the religion of cathedrals, temples, joss-houses, etc. The religion of nature you will probably see but little of. And now, Bro. Bennett, for this great task and for this special purpose

May you hav power to giv that knowledge birth
In all the speeches of the babbling earth;
May you hav all wisdom, human and divine,
That art can teach or science can define.
Invoke a band of philosophic souls,
Advocates of truth instead of musty scrolls;
Franklin and Paine, Jefferson and Hume,
To be your body-guard; your fertil brain illume.
Pythagoras and Solon and Socrates the grand,
Swedenborg and Luther and mighty Talleyrand;
Diderot and Voltaire, old Calvin if you please,
And don't forget the better part to fill your task with ease,
Hypatia, Artemesia, the queen of Sheba too,
Bathsheba and Herodias, the beautiful and true;
Washington and Martha, and Mary, Scotland's queen;
Lucretia Mott, Ayesha, Joan and Josephine.
And don't be too particular, and some of these exclude,
They'v learned life's lesson thoroughly and will its ills elude.
They'll travel in the atmosphere, and cost you not a dime,
They'll giv you luck on ocean, and health in every clime.
The perihelia ne'er can harm, nor blow its deadly blast,
And in immortal arms of love will surely hold you fast.
You hav a glorious destiny, the gods declare it so,
So take this band of counselors wherever you may go.
Just write their names on paper and wear them near your heart,
Invoke their sacred presence before you dare to start.
And if you wish some others, just add them to the roll,
The good, the wise, the noble, magnanimous of soul.
They'll understand your mission, and fire with flaming zeal
Your brain and pen your books to write for human weal.
Then harness for the contest, be cheerful, strong, and brave,
Sweep onward over continents, and o'er the ocean wave,
Tell us of human progress, of habits strange and strong,
Search for primal causes, in ancient lands of song,
Where the illuminati for deep arcana sought,
But foiled, for the Shekinah never can be bought.
It is the growth of ages, a high and cultured brain,
Where gods can pour evangels like general floods of rain.
Through all the battling ages, the leaders were inspired;
The gods of either good or ill their bosoms hotly fired;
And these years of grace the gods select their tools,
Some independent thinkers, some barefaced fools;
Some who taught of blood are bigots "over there,"
And they return through weaklings the ignorant to scare.
But men of thought and action who're on the other shore
Work now on independent brain, as in the days of yore,
That light and love and liberty may flow to all the lands,
And disinthrall the nations from superstition's bands.

Can't you induce some good Liberal, a scientist, to accompany you? Throwing Mrs. Chase's paper out of the mails is a mean, contemptible act. When will the government hav men of honor in public office?

D. HIGBIE, M.D.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., May 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav had considerable anxiety to know what decision you should come to make on the question of your trip round the world, but now I am greatly rejoiced to hear that you hav decided in the affirmativ. If the contemplated trip proves successful in regard to health and safety during your long absence we hav no fear but that it will prove to be one of the richest and grandest productions in point of history that the world has produced of the kind. I see there are a few who desire you to stay at home, but eventually they will be satisfied, no doubt, that had they had the selection of the man to perform the journey and write its history, it would hav been you. Herein I hand you the $5 promised, and bid you farewell, wishing you a happy journey and a safe return. J. KINSER.

Adam and Eve.

BY ALHAZA.

Yesterday paradise, now a dark wilderness,
This is a labyrinth many hav trod;
Blood-stained and sorrowful,
Then broken hearts were full,
Dark as a curse from the bosom of God.

Breathing of tenderness, Satan defended us,
Yet I wist nothing of all my deep guilt;
Faint with soft weariness,
Joy turned to dreariness,
Oh, how insipid the bowers that we built!

Ha! my beard's turniug gray, losing its golden ray,
Hark, what a chime from that grim, ancient tower!
Dark were the aisles with sin,
Hearts of woe lurked within,
White-robed the priest who had pardoning power.

Ponderous bells of fear, say, are ghouls clinging near?
How can thy massiv weight swing in this tower,
Thou art like one to come,
Is thy sweet music dumb,
Save when pure souls open death's carven door?

But like an angel's lute, sighing when earth is mute,
Clad with her loveliness, weeping in penitence,
Knowing not crime though its punishment fall.
Stars clustered lovingly,
Listened approvingly,
"Thou art not guilty, love, I will bear all."

That was the woman spoke, thus was the silence broke,
Twanging of harps in the heaven was still;
Poisonous tongues of sin,
Angel's, not devil's din,
Sound from the clouds, and the deep forest fill.

Just let them run their race, here is a brighter place,
Smiling through tears.
How you lean, love, on me;
Madly I drink that sigh,
Let the seventh heaven die,
Purest stars rise, dearest, after the fall.

Stern was God's iron rule, when the sweet air was cool;
Mild and more truthful, kind Satan did come;
Princely and free from rant,
Hating the angel's cant,
Spirit of liberty, share my poor home.

Liberty and Brotherhood.

(A tribute to Mrs. H. S. Lake.)

BY SADA BAILEY.

Sister, had I never known the trials of a reformer's life,
Had I never felt the anguish of persecution's strife,
I might not now stand by thy side upon this platform free,
And offer thee my firm right hand and truest sympathy.
When women know each other's hearts and love as sisters should,
We'll surely lift the race of man to human brotherhood.

Thou hast inspired this tribute because thy soul is true:
Because thou'lt dare to stand alone, or with the precious few;
Because thou'lt dare to speak the truth no matter what betide,
And also dare to liv the right, without deceit's false pride.
Friends, when we all are honest and seek truth as we should,
We'll onward march to liberty and human brotherhood!

A man may brave contumely and, with courage, nobly dare,
Yet few of Mme. Grundy's hounds are on his track to snare;
But when a woman stems the tide while persecutions roll,
Her guardian angels only know the struggles of her soul!
Ah, when we wring Dame Grundy's neck, as soon we will and should,
We'll hav some chance for liberty and human brotherhood!

Friends, do you know what crimes this woman has committed?
Why her case unto the devil the Christians hav submitted?
Why she's the awfulest woman that walks this earthly sod?
Because, she loves humanity, and not the Christians' God!
When we, like her, let gods alone, and liv for human good.
Oh, how we'll love sweet liberty, and human brotherhood!

They say thoul't trample sacred things—thy soul no worship knows;
Thou answerest superstition thus, and deal it crushing blows,
"We worship truth and science, sacred things are life and love;
We reverence nature on the earth and in the skies above."
And all thy soul's devotion for the beautiful and good
Helps lift the poor and lowly to human brotherhood.

Oh, how divine it is to liv in freedom's holy light,
And how the soul is bathed in joy, when we love and do the right!
Sister, our humble prayer and blessing we freely giv to-day.
May angels now attend thee and guide thy onward way;
The League is truely grateful, and thy labors for its good
Bid us all cheer for liberty! and human brotherhood!

IN Paris false ears are now manufactured for the toilet. Ladies who think they hav ugly ears place these artistic productions under luxurious tresses of false hair, fasten them to the natural ears, and wear them for show. False hair, false teeth, false breasts, false hips, false calves, false ears—what next?

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue of Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentives and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest valne, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY,

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOON, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. DUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING
IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.
Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.
Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.
Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.
Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.

Our depots are open free for inspection to all classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.
NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.
JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be fonnd in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cnres now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that at fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DeT. TRUAX,
376 Dean street,

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DeT. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

NO. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my sufferiug from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day, To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pain lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the WILSONIA GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF HARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR

THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, an die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

How can that be miserable for one which all must of necessity undergo?—Cicero."

He who does not like living in the furnished lodgings of tradition must build his own house, his own system of thought and faith for himself.—Zschokke.

Oh, blindness to the future, kindly given,
That each may fill the circle marked by heaven;
Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall;
Atoms or systems into ruin hurled,
And now a bubble burst and now a world.
—Pope.

The difference between business done on the principle of co-operation and that done on the principle of competition is that one has a soul in it, and the other has not. One is done on the principle of heartless grasp and greed, reckless of the welfare of others, reckless to honor, too; the other is done on the principle of "liv and let liv," no gain dishonestly won; no barter of square dealing or of integrity. As some one has well expressed it, co-operation is simply business, whether national or individual, on a religious basis, or, if you prefer it, on a moral basis.—Rev. J. C. Learned.

I am the daughter of earth and water,
And the nursling of the sky;
I pass through the pores of the ocean and shores;
I change, but I cannot die.
For after the rain when with never a stain
The pavilion of heaven is bare,
And the winds and sunbeams, with their convex gleams,
Build up the blue dome of air,
I silently laugh at my own cenotaph,
And out of the caverns of rain,
Like a child from the womb, like a ghost from the tomb,
I arise and upbuild it again. —Shelley's Cloud.

There is nothing more conduciv to an enlightened skepticism and its attendant spirit, toleration, than the spectacle of various religious creeds, each maintained by intelligent and pious men. A king of Arabia in the fourth century received an embassy from the Byzantine emperor, with a request that Christians might be allowed to settle in his kingdom, and also that he would make Christianity the religion of the state. Felix, the king, assented to the first proposition; with reference to the second he replied: "I reign over men's bodies, not over their opinions. I exact from my subjects obedience to the government; as to their religious doctrins, as to that, the only judge is the Creator." —Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

It is in reality as foolish to pray for rain or a fair wind as it would be to pray that the sun should set in the middle of the day. It is as foolish to pray for the healing of a disease or for daily bread as it is to pray for a pure heart, or for mental repose, as it is to pray for help in sickness or misfortune. All the events which occur upon the earth result from law. Even those actions which are entirely dependent on the caprices of the memory, or the impulse of the passions, are shown by statistics to be, when taken in the gross, entirely independent of the human will. As a single atom, man is an enigma; as a whole he is a mathematical problem. As an individual he is a free agent; as a species, he is the offspring of necessity.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

Let us work in peace, love, and unity with all who will stand upon our platforms, and if some few think or do what we believe is wrong we will talk, argue, prove, and convince them of their errors, or let them convince us that they are right. I am satisfied there is far more danger in an over-cautious, selfish exclusion than there is in a broad, free platform. Error will never triumph where free discussion is allowed. I am ready to accept even the help of a Catholic priest if he will work for the demands of Liberalism. But this dividing off into cliques, sects, and parties is deleterious to our beloved cause and not at all in accordance with our motto of the highest good of the greatest number.—Elmina D. Slenker.

The scientist recognizes the fact that human beings come into existence by the same natural process as that by which all forms of life are propagated and continued. He sees that individual life arises from organization, and believes it must discontinue when the organization terminates. He believes in no future state of individual intellect and life. When we pass from this form of existence our individuality ceases; the particles of matter of which we are composed return to the condition from which they were evolved, and we go back to the state of unconsciousness we occupied previous to our individual existence. He sees nothing terrible in this. As he does not mourn because he had no individual existence before his birth, he does not mourn because he has none after his death. It must be admitted that this view is infinitly better than the Christian belief in an eternity of suffering and unhappiness for the vast majority of mankind, without object or benefit.—Bennett's Fear of Death.

In all ages reason has been regarded as the enemy of religion. Nothing has been considered so pleasing to the deity as a total denial of the authority of your own mind. Self-reliance has been thought a deadly sin; and the idea of living and dying without the aid and consolation of superstition has always horrified the church. By some unaccountable infatuation, belief has been and still is considered of immense importance. All religions hav been based upon the idea that God will forever reward the true believer and eternally damn the man who doubts or denies. Belief is regarded as the one essential thing. To practice justice, to love mercy, is not enough. You must believe in some incomprehensible creed. You must say, "Once one is three, and three times one is one." The man who practiced every virtue but failed to believe was execrated. Nothing so outrages the feelings of the church as a moral unbeliever; nothing so horrible as a charitable Atheist.—Ingersoll.

A young man residing in Keene,
Kissed his sweetheart behind a large screen.
He made too much noise
And was heard by some boys,
Who informed the girl's pa—which was mean.

"Can I giv my son a college education at home?" asks a proud and anxious father. "Certainly," replies an expert, who knows all about it; "all you want is a baseball guide, a racing shell, and a few packages of cigarets."

THE SPIDER SPIED HER.

A little spider spun a spin,
I stood to see him spin it;
He spun him up,
He spun him down,
And spun him round in a minit.

As soon as ever his spin was spun,
A little fly was in it;
And the little spider
Ate her up,
And nothin' was said agin' it!

PATERNAL WISDOM.

"My son, you had better tarry,"
Said the father, "and not marry,
Or you will catch Old Harry.
And then you'll feel forlorn;
For marriage is a bubble,
Which hursts and ends in trouble,
And makes the wretch see double,
Just as sure's you are born.
Now among the girl's your scooting,
Dazzled by their frills and fluting,
But you'd better mind the tooting
Of your dear old daddy's horn."

THREE WOMEN.

Three women went sailing out into the street
To the brown-stone front where the red flag hung.
They jostled the crowd all day on their feet
While "going and going and gone" was sung.
For women must go where bargains are had,
And buy old trash if never so bad,
And husbands must ever be groaning.

Three husbands, all hungry, went homeward to dine,
But when they arrived there was nothing to eat.
Three women, all crazy and feeling so fine,
Were gabbling of bargains along on the street,
For women must talk of bargains they buy,
And homes must suffer and babes must cry,
And husbands must ever be groaning.

Three women were showing their husbands with glee
Their bargains at prices that never were beat,
Three husbands all starving and mad as could be,
Were tossing the bargains out into the street.
For men don't know when bargains are cheap,
And women, poor creatures, do nothing but weep,
And husbands must ever be groaning.

Notes and Clippings.

ISAAC W. BAILY, a prominent classleader in Philadelphia, has been held to trial in that city for stealing a book from the establishment of J. B. Lippincott & Co.

FATHERS QUINN and Preston are in luck. They are to hav the title of Monsignori, to be private chamberlains to the holy father, and the prelates to the pontifical household. What a fine opportunity they hav to be thankful to his holiness at Rome for such great honor!

THE other day as a fishing party in Pennsylvania was returning home they passed the farm of A. McFadden, Esq., in Franktown township, and saw a pig milking a cow. It was in a sitting posture, and the cow stood very still, while the pig seemed to be enjoying the feast.

AMSTERDAM, by the latest census, has a Jewish population of over 40,000. In that city, as, indeed, in the whole of Holland, the Jews hav fared well. There they hav found an asylum, when in most other parts of Europe they had not a resting-place and there they hav remained, prospered, and multiplied.

A CARD has been distributed in our streets headed "Two Roads," and conveying the information that the broad road leads to death, misery, and hell, while the narrow road leads to life, happiness, and heaven. One of them recently came into the hands of a wicked wag, who indorsed upon it: "Since this card was printed both roads hav been consolidated."

AT the Moody and Sankey meetings in San Francisco, "in the front row, with those who responded most promptly in soprano to brother Sankey's 'We will now sing,' always sat Mrs. King, while opposit her, on the next row of chairs most affected by those who sang bass, sat Major Ranlett." These points are recalled now by the elopement of Mrs. King and the Major.

CHARLES MAUDE, a Salem, Conn., farmer, when arrested and asked why he beat his wife replied that he had orders from the angel Gabriel, with whom, he said, he was in constant communication. His wife had offended the angel, who told him to whip her. Maude was sent to the insane asylum, but Gabriel was not punished. Thus does the world use its prophets now!

THE trouble in the Plane street Presbyterian church was once more before the Presbytery of Newark on Wednesday evening. Matthew N. Hawkins was tried before the session of the church for slander in saying that the pastor, the Rev. Isaac Davenport, was a liar. Hawkins admitted that he said so, and wanted an opportunity to prove it by witnesses, but was refused the opportunity.

LORD SELBORNE, the Lord Chancellor of London, in a letter to the Right Rev. Christopher Wordsworth, bishop of Lincoln, expresses the opinion that the revised Testament cannot be read in the churches or the English church until it has been recommended or authorized by some sufficient public authority, and that any clergyman so using it incurs the risk of being held as an offender against the law.

DAVID SEAMAN is a pious church-member of Freeport, Long Island. He is zealous in the cause of Jesus, and thinks unbelievers should get roasted in hell forever. He has been regarded so faithful that he has been made sexton of the church. But there are always drawbacks more or less serious in every case. The worst thing we know about Bro. Seaman is that a colored woman in his neighborhood has sworn a child on him. It is indeed unfortunate that any follower of Jesus should be so persecuted as to hav a colored child to father.

A PIOUS man has made it his mission to travel daily on the trains running through Meriden, Conn., and distribute slips containing scripture texts and brief exhortations. One of the latter reads: "No efforts of yours, no good works, no good resolutions, no good prayers, can translate you from fitness for hell to fitness for heaven." Others are still stronger in their doctrinal assertions. The Springfield Republican says that one of Connecticut's best clergymen was inquired of by a stranger colporteur not long since whether he felt his soul was safe. His reply was, "I deem your question exceedingly impertinent."

THE nervous prostration and suffering suffered by sewing-machine operators, caused by the absorption of the vital electrical forces of the system, by the constant contact of the feet with the ordinary iron treadle, is obviated by an ingenious invention of Dr. Van Cort of 168th street. It consists of a sandal or cover for the treadle, constructed of wood or other non-conducting material, and which serves to prevent the outflow of an electric current from the body, which is otherwise quickened and promoted by the movement of the machine. It also prevents cold feet. The sandal can be quickly adjusted upon the treadle of any machine.

DURING a thunder storm in Union township, Jasper county, on Sunday, the 22d, the electric fluid played some saucy and fantastic tricks at the farm house of James Landers. One bolt struck Mrs. Landers on the left elbow, skipped to the hip, and being pocketed into her left shoe, burst it into strings; but the most singular of all was the fact that another bolt of the sprightly fluid served Mrs. Lee in exactly the same manner, excepting the attack was on the right instead of the left side—everything, to the bursting of the shoe. Both ladies were slightly shocked, but not seriously injured. Mr. Lander's father was struck and knocked out of doors, but not seriously injured. There was one dog in the house and one under the house; both were killed.

THE admirer of two girls at Waupaca, Oregon, could not choose between them, and neither was willing to relinquish her claims in favor of the other. They therefore agreed to decide the question by the toss of a coin, and the tossing was done, carefully and fairly, in the presence of an invited company. The loser accepted her luck uncomplainingly, and is to be first bridesmaid at the wedding. A somewhat similar case had a different termination at Bowerton, Michigan. The girls, in this instance, were sisters, and they were willing to divide the lover between them. In order to carry out that idea they hav started for Utah, where they will practice polygamy; but the harmonious sisters hav exacted a solemn vow from the man never to hav more than two wives.

A BAPTIST minister by the name of Kellogg, having a wife and three children, has become intimate with one of his flock, a married woman with a good, indulgent husband and two small children. The woman's husband, however, was not a Christian, and the Rev. Kellogg thought his wife legitimate prey to his lust. The upshot of it is that the "divine" has deserted his wife and family and also induced the woman to leave her husband and little children. The guilty pair repaired to the house of a neighbor, another church member, to indulge in "nest-hiding" and all that the term implies, till they were threatened by the indignant citizens who rallied to tar and feather the reverend debauchee, who got wind of his danger and fled. But he was not to be cheated out of his prey, as the sequel will show. He wrote to the woman to get rid of her husband, how and in what manner he did not care. But the husband was not easily disposed of; he stuck right there. Having failed in this diabolical scheme he then commanded the bewitched woman to persuade her husband to sell his farm and then to rob him of the money and come to him in Iowa, where they would start an eating-house and worship the Lord. But the husband, though indulgent and usually accommodating, clung to his farm and would not part with it; whereupon the reverend rascal, with a cheek that would make a government mule blush, wrote to the injured man that he was extremely sorry that he had broken up his family, but if he would rent him his farm he would come and work it, and they could all liv together and worship the Lord! The poor husband was now in despair, and instead of shooting the audacious villian he gave his erring wife all his spare cash and parted with her, and she went to join the elder where they could worship the Lord and sing that comforting hymn:

> "Jesus paid it all,
> All to him I owe;
> Sin had left a crimson stain,
> He washed me white as snow."

THE two little sons of a noted Brooklyn clergyman engaged in a discussion on heaven and the probable occupation of the ransomed who are to dwell there. Johnny asked Jimmy if he supposed they would hav apples in heaven, to which Jimmy replied that he supposed they would, for the tree of life was to bear twelve manner of fruits, and he saw no reason why apples should not be among them. The inquiring Johnny then suggested a difficulty about the cores, and said he was afraid boys would not be allowed to drop them on the golden pavements. Jimmy meditated a moment, and then said that a way out of this difficulty appeared plain to him. He told Johnny that they could go to the edge of heaven, and lean over the wall and drop the cores down at the people on earth. "We are told," continued Jimmy, "that we shall hav a great many pleasures in heaven, and I don't see why that shouldn't be one of them." How would it do to throw their apple cores on their brothers and cousins who are broiling and frying in the sulphurous lake beneath? According to the true faith that would increase their happiness more than anything else.

THE rains of late hav been so frequent and abundant that vegetation was never fresher and richer at the opening of summer than now. Field and forests are in their most beautiful garb, and every growing thing givs evidences of health and strong vitality. The spring may not hav been early in its coming, but once it came, favorable weather soon brought forward the crops, and now they are well advanced for for the season. But notwithstanding this general promis of a fruitful harvest the enemies of growing vegetation are numerous and threatening. The following are some of the reports which reach us. In Boyle county, Ky., the fly has almost destroyed the wheat crop; locusts are splitting the limbs of fruit trees in Oconee county so that they die; about two-thirds of the apples in Ohio hav blighted and fallen off within the past two weeks; wheat birds hav totally destroyed large fields of the growing grain of McLennan county, Texas; in Fannin county, Texas, grasshoppers are found in millions, and farmers are in a great state of alarm; Nevada is completely overrun with grasshoppers. They consume a crop, leaving nothing green behind them; the farmers around Kirksville, Mo., report the county alive with chintz bugs that are doing great damage to the crops; grasshoppers are on the march on the Truckee, Cal., meadows. They ate up forty acres of prime wheat for one farmer; the corn in much of the state of Indiana has been so thoroughly damaged by wire worms and grubs that replanting became necessary; the North Carolina locusts are doing great damage to young apple orchards. They split the fruit-bearing twigs, which soon wither and fall to the ground; grubs or frost hav made very many missing hills among the hop fields of Oneida, N. Y. Many new yards are being set out, but the crop will be short for a year; reports from Strausstown, Pa., say that the army worm is destroying the corn as fast as it makes its appearance above the ground. It ruins a tobacco field in a single night; a parasite has appeared in the orange groves of the West Indies, Florida, and California that has ruined vast numbers of trees, and threatens to seriously interfere with orange culture.

News of the Week.

LAST week 17,420 immigrants landed at Castle Garden.

JOHN G. SAXE's only remaining daughter died last Friday.

GARFIELD is off on a junketing tour in a government steamer.

ACCORDING to the recent census the population of London is 3,814,571.

SECRETARY WINDOM says that Garfield and the cabinet "hav no issue with Conkling!"

THE Virginia Readjusters hav nominated Col. Cameron for governor. He is Mahone's candidate.

TALMAGE says the new revision is "a mutilation and a profanation, pedantic, capricious, and empiric."

JOHN H. GRISCOM, of Chicago, is trying to go forty-five days without eating. He is on his thirteenth day.

SLIGHT shocks of earthquakes hav been felt around Vesuvius. Broad streams of lava are flowing down the mountain.

THE President has appointed Addison Brown, of New York, judge for the southern district of New York, vice Choate, resigned.

Two men were killed, two seriously wounded, and thirty cars wrecked by a collision between two freight trains at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, on the 5th.

THE drivers of the brewery wagons in this city struck last Monday for a reduction of working hours and fifty cents per hour for Sunday work.

SEVERAL coastwise steamers hav been unable to proceed to sea owing to the strike of the firemen for $5 per month additional wages. Two companies hav yielded to the demand.

MOST of the mechanics in New York and adjacent cities hav had a half holiday on Saturday given them by their employers. The victory was celebrated by a festival last Saturday.

THERE was an immense attendance at the funeral of the late M. Emile Littre in Paris last Saturday. A body of Freethinkers protested against holding any religious ceremony over the remains.

JOSEPH SABIN, the veteran Nassau street bookseller and bibliophile, is dead. Comstock arrested him once, but the case never came to trial. It is said he knew the most about books of any man living.

THREE little boys were smothered by a sand bank falling upon them while at play in East Broadway, this city, last week. They were under the dirt only twenty minutes, but when dug out were dead.

MAYOR GRACE has appointed James S. Coleman commissioner of street cleaning, and the Board of Health has confirmed him, under the new law. Perhaps New York may now hav streets in which pestilence is not bred every hot day.

IT is said that First Assistant Postmaster-General Tyner, who issued the order suspending the Physiologist and forcing Dr. Foote's Health Monthly and other Liberal papers to pay exorbitant postage, will be shortly superseded by ex-senator Spencer.

THE deadlock over the election of United States senators still continues in the legislature at Albany. It seems to be pretty certain that Conkling and Platt will not go back. Grant has returned from Mexico and is said to be going to Albany to help his friend Roscoe.

THE attempt to evict tenants in Ireland has resulted in almost a civil war. Troops are freely used, and several collisions, in which numbers were injured and some killed, hav occurred between them and the peasantry. All the houses along two streets in Cork hav been completely wrecked.

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER VIII.

"'And which way did'st thou choose, Alamontada, to lead thee out of the dark regions of doubt into the realms of light?' I asked him one day.

"'I also,' answered he, 'was once tortured by the frightful uncertainty about the worth of my life and my future fate. To whom hav not these things, sooner or later, been of importance? But only two ways I always found which could lead me to some knowledge of these matters—the way of mere experience and the way of self-acting reason.

"'For a long time the way of experience seemed to me the safer. But soon I found that my objects lay beyond the reach of human experience; that I never, in the present conditions and with the present instruments of my soul, could comprehend the supernatural causes of things or phenomena which surrounded me; that I would strive in vain to make experiences in a world for which no wings had been given me; that I, 'tis true, was myself a part of this dark world of powers and causes, but without sense of perception for it, only with sense of perception for its workings.

"'So there remained to me only the way of reason. I felt vividly that I, speaking of convictions, was compelled to observe the laws of reason. What contradicted them could not convince me. I noticed that all mankind, without agreement, without ever having seen each other, at all times, in all zones, possessed the same laws of reason as myself, and that they only deviated from me in the application of them. I noticed that the new-born child began to think and act in these laws just as soon as it was, through a chain of own-experiences and their comparison with one another, enabled to distinguish itself from other objects. I found the same also to be true with the worn-out, aged man, whose power of imagination was exhausted, whose memory was blighted. Until the life of his body became extinct the laws of his thinking retained their supremacy, although through the lameness of his sensual organs, as, for instance, if he, through the loss of memory, became childish, he was no longer able to value rightly the objects about him, and to apply rightly the laws of his individuality.

"'If I think and act in these laws, everything before me develops itself in pure harmony. If I attempt to escape their commands, all crumbles together into a confused chaos; I stagger among contradiction; I am insane.

"'The organization of my individuality compels me to think of all as cause or effect. I recognize myself as the cause of my thoughts, wishes, and acts. I cannot help attribute a primitiv cause to the existence of the world of powers which surround me, of which I perceive only their workings upon me, not the powers themselvs. Even the Atheist does not deny this away. He calls the secret, co-working powers of nature primitiv cause of all those phenomena that float about us. He givs to them eternity, which others ascribe to their God, and puts the strength of his doubts against the existence of God, or his proof for the sufficiency of the secret natural powers for demonstration of the world, in our non-acquaintance with them. We know it too little in order to judge about it rightly, says he. Well, I am of his opinion. He also has accepted a highest secret cause of the universe. It is his god. But he preserves his powers for beings working unconsciously, according to laws. Nature, says he, so created from eternity, brought forth since eternity, without being conscious thereof, the phenomena and their changes. So then man alone would be the only rational being, because he has consciousness of life. So then nature would be a god, who produced nobler things than he is himself. The universe would be a dead machine, which does not know itself, but brings forth beings which would deserve to be called gods, because they alone really liv and observe the creation and changes of nature, or the god unconscious of himself. The thought shocks me. So long as I am a rational being, I cannot adhere to it.

"'Does reason compel me to accept a primordial being, so it compels me, at the same time, not to imagin it more imperfect than I am myself. This wonderful harmony in the whole universe, these laws of the secret powers of nature, which govern the immeasurable all, are so lofty, as no thought at first could be thought by me, and ever been thought by mortals. I imagin from this a power similar to myself, similar in regard to self-acting and consciousness. And so deep as a single atom lies under the organization of the universe, just so deep lies man, with his wisdom and power, under the wisdom and power of the supreme being.

"'Yea, dear sir, he who cannot break the laws of reason, cannot drive out of the universe the all-arranging, ruling, all-animating, primitiv being, into the realm of non-existence. Man stands, on account of his consciousness and lofty qualities, upon a high round in the scale of things. And a proof of his loftiness is that by his reason he is compelled to think God. He sees in God himself, and again, within himself the reflection of the sacred primitiv being.

"'May an egotistical, merely school-philosopher, more in order to shine than to imbue convictions, confuse the understanding, commence quarrels, and imagin himself great, to hav proved there is no God? The outcry of all nature reëchoes eternally in his breast.

"'God is. I can entangle myself, intoxicate myself with fancies, and always I return to the thought, God is! The voice of reason penetrates all sophistry. All nations, all ages of the world, one untaught by the other, pronounce the name of the godhead. Only different must the human mind imagin the greatness of God, because the degrees of its education were different. The Japanese and the Christian, the Jew and the Siamese, the Mussulman and the negro—all bow worshiping before him whose picture, in the brighter or more obscure mirror of their imagination, floats clearer or more confusedly.

"'What is demanded of me? Shall I doubt the existence of the eternal, primitiv spirit? Then you wish that I should doubt even the existence of all things, the magnificence, wisdom, and holiness in the universe, or, rather, believe that that which has given us hearing, sight, and understanding could itself not hear, see, and understand. Shall I doubt the eternal truthfulness of the principles of reason? Then you would that I should prefer contradiction to the agreement of my knowledge; I should prefer insanity to truth; doubt my own doubts; stagger from nonsense to nonsense. Remarkable it is, that all skeptics in ordinary life thought and acted as reasonable as others; only in the study-room they became confused. Their best works are masterpieces of keen-sensed insanity.

"'All that one can say, looking at the wonderful universe and the scrupulously computed linking of things, is, I cannot comprehend it! Poor man, how mayest thou wish it even? If thou descendest in thy shafts thousands of feet below the ground in order to watch the working of subterranean nature, where she, in her dark, rocky chambers, boils the metals, begets rivers, and prepares volcanic eruptions, ah! then thou hast hardly scratched the thin skin of our immense globe. Its gigantic intestines thou hast not seen. If thine eye, armed with telescope, roameth through the wide realm of skies and measureth the heavenly bodies as they untiringly and harmoniously circle around each other; if thou in the immense distance discoverest a new world, the existence of which no mortal being else imagined, and for the distance of which every earthly measure becometh too small, what hast thou? O thou microscopical, invisible being, thou tremblest before the greatness of the water-drop in which thou livest, and prophesiest, shuddering, the possibility of a second and third one, although thine own appeareth to be immeasurable. Thou knowest nothing of the rushing, eternal ocean, the depth of which hath no bottom, the area of which no shores.

"'And yet the spiteful, haughty little worm in its drop philosophizes about the immeasurable and denies what it does not comprehend. The cause cannot be at the same time its effect, the comprehending not at the same time the comprehended.

"'A wisdom speaks to me from all quarters of the universe, before whose greatness all measure ceases. We are in our knowledge so scanty, so poor, that we strive in vain after a worthier representation of the most high. The perception of him by the wisest upon the earth is always a man-god. But as to us children, even this representation is gratifying; so let us keep the faint picture of the invisible father until he once unveils himself, he whose veil is the sky, and the flying heavenly bodies therein the atom in the sunbeam.'"

The pictures of the god represent him as deformed, having a back covered with bristles, and the head of a crocodile, an ape, or a hippopotamus. In the myth of Isis and Osiris, Seth, or Typhon, plays a prominent part as the destroyer. (George Ebers.)

This Set or Seth is easily recognizable as the Seithyn Saidi (Said in the seventh sign) Said Wrn (Said, sexual energy; Wrn, resting-place, tomb, from which we hav the Latin Urnus—urn, a receptacle for the ashes of the dead). Said Wrn becomes Sadwrn and Saturn and Satan. And as he reigns through the winter he is invested later with Capricornic attributes, hoofs, horns, etc., but the barbed tail of Scorpio sticks to him and proclaims his identity. From this attribute we hav the word Satyr, a mythical being, half man, half god.

The Hyksos, or shepherd kings, who conquered Egypt were Seth worshipers, but Set to them was a blood-thirsty destroyer who delighted in war and to whom human sacrifices were a delight. As Sadwrn, Seithyn, Septem, Seth, he was worshiped on the seventh day, and later he was called the Lord of Sabaoth. After the expulsion of the shepherd kings from Egypt and the re-establishment of sun-worship proper, in its astronomical and beneficent aspects, a shepherd or Seth worshiper became an abomination to the Egyptians.

The Hebrews were shepherds and dwelt in Goshen, as they were an offense to the Egyptians for this reason. When they were expelled from Egypt they were still Seth worshipers, and trace their descent from Seth (who they say is the third son of Adam, Adim, or Menw), who is identical with Satan and Siva. Some of the Hebrews had imbibed Egyptian ideas and worshiped the sacred animals, which were again an abomination to the Hebrews. Hence they assert that all red-haired Jews are descendants of those whom Moses compelled to drink the water that the golden calf was dissolved in.

The stigma of Typhonic is here reversed, and they are called children of Belial, Baal (Baal Shaddai was the god of Abraham). The Hebrews worshiped Seth as Moloch, and passed their children through the fire to him. The peculiar symbol of Satan, Saturn, or Seth was the linga, represented by an upright stone in Keltic Maen Syth, the earliest forms of which are still extant in Cornwall and are called tolmans, from twll, hole, and maen, stone, they being perforated to represent the female attribute or yoni as well as the male, or linga. This is referred to as a pillar in the scriptures, and a rock and sometimes a tower. This symbol was evidently in use previous to the time of the discovery of the movements of the planet Saturn. Hence the Greek myth that Chronos Saturn was deposed by Jupiter and assigned a place in heaven. From the crude form of the tolman we can trace the scientific and ornamental form of the Egyptian obelisks, which seem to hav served the purpose of a gnomon to mark the hours by its shadow falling in different places, as is referred to in the dial of Ahaz; also as an almanac. As Hü in Hefin or the sun in Cancer, they were decorated with the symbol of the crab. As the generator they were capped with a pyramid, symbolic of the sun in Aries and Libra, and as the square was the peculiar attribute of the first ray or sun in cancer, so they are four-sided.

As the sun of the new year was Horus, and the midsummer sun Ra, so the autumnal sun was Tum—the babe, the man, the old man. This annual drama of the sun's course was also carried out quarterly. It is probable that the three eagles upon each face of the obelisk represent the months, as Horus, Ra, and Tum, while the column of hieroglyphics under each eagle represent the day of each month, with the peculiar duties for each day in season, also the red-letter days and festivals.

The diurnal course of the sun was supposed to be carried out in the same method. Thus, in the morning he was Horus, the babe; at midday, Ra, the man, the hero; and at eve, Tum, the old man.

Tum, like Saturn or Chronos, is supposed to be the oldest of the Egyptian deities, as he is the father of the new sun. If the Egyptologists were to seek the meaning of these hieroglyphics as illustrations of ideas rather than sounds or syllables, it is likely they would find the solution much easier. As the cartoons in the illustrated papers of to-day are more instructiv to the ignorant than twenty columns of reading matter, so the symbols carved upon these obelisks were readily understood by the lower classes of Egypt.

The priests had a hieratic writing of words and syllables, which corresponds very closely with the Druidic or Ogham characters; but the methods of comparison used by Egyptologists in deciphering hieroglyphics are very deficient.

In our own day, Russia is typified by a bear, England by a lion, France by a cock; and if in future ages some scientific New Zealander should visit the buried and ruined cities of the United States he might, with equal propriety, assert that upon the ruins he found hieroglyphics; that the American deity was an old man called Uncle Sam, and that a goddess called Columbia was also held in veneration, as many prints and statues of these people were found in the ruins.

I may be thought presumptuous in advancing this theory of the antiquity of the Keltic Druids, but oriental researches show that a powerful people existed previous to the time assigned to the Jewish occupation of Canaan. Hittites and Hivites are mentioned; Hü-worshipers or Huites, while the Cuthites, Cushites, or Kelts are mentioned very early in history as worshipers of the solar deity.

Canon Rawlinson, in his "Origin of Nations," especially seeks to throw discredit upon the antiquity of the British Druids, but makes several very fatal admissions to the contrary, and the argument is weak throughout, depending mostly upon Cæsar's authority.

Mr. Bonwick is quoted at present for an authority as an ethnologist who asserts that the Welsh are a decidedly mixed race of Iberian stock mixed with the later Keltic type. I should like to know upon what grounds he bases this idea? By examination of the skulls of Welshmen of the present day, I should think that they are decidedly mixed after centuries of contact with Saxon and Norman races. If by examination of the skulls excavated from long-buried ruins he makes this assertion, how does he identify any individual skull, whether it was a Kelt, a Roman, a Saxon, or a Dane who carried it upon his shoulders?

It is claimed that naturalists can, from a single bone, reconstruct the whole animal, though previously unknown to them, and from the cave man of Mentone they hav made illustrations of what the human race originally was. How is it that in Connaught this troglodytic type of countenance is found at the present day? Here, their last refuge, driven by successiv persecutions, the only remnants of the pure Irish stock are found. "To hell or Connaught!" has been the cry of the English soldiery whenever they hav sought to crush the Irish sentiment here. By a continuous crushing and brutalizing treatment the race has reverted to its original type, with the short upper lip, immense, carnivorous teeth, and receding forehead of the troglodyte. This type of countenance is not found anywhere else upon the face of the globe. The Iberian type, acquired when Galway had an immense commercial intercourse with Spain, is also to be found, but it reverts to its distinctivly Iberian type as different to the Keltic as light to darkness.

Why do the authorities of the English church take alarm at present at the Welsh Druidic philosophy and train their artillery upon it to discredit it before even an assertion of anything is forthcoming? Do they dread any revelation which may be made? Do they know that in the Welsh language and the bardic mysteries there is that knowledge which will cause the system of Christianity to melt under its rays and dissolve into nothing? It is evident that they fear it. After ages of service as a faithful policeman and conservator of the peace, the devil is going to fail them. A closer look at him divests him of his terror and brings him into a very close relationship with the Jewish Jehovah and the Christian God. He is not half as black as he has been painted. Heaven and hell are very near each other. Priestcraft must wane, and humanity be emancipated. Let the light shine, and let the truth against the world be made known. J. H. DAVIES.

Formation and Harmony of the Solar System.

BY FRANCIS D. LACY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In addition to my communication on "Planetary Development," I would further state: That for some purpose the universe exists, and to that purpose all materiality is appropriated. The problem of the origin we shall leave for the unsophisticated to cavil upon, since it is sufficient for us to deal with matter as we find it, accepting both the spiritual and the material as being but one, and that self-existent and eternal. For the present we shall endeavor to consider some of the formations, evolutions, and general developments achieved by nature, and from the result of our conclusions see what inference is shown for the existence of a pervading intellectuality.

First. Since the spirit of nature abhors idleness, action is the order of the universe. Every animated being or particle of material is forever seeking its equilibrium, while the elements throughout the universe are kept in a continual state of agitation and warfare. Every creature or insect of life, from the greatest magnitude to the infinitesimal, livs in view of but one object—self-preservation! But not a creature among the innumerable species, not man excepted, while fulfiling his selfish mission, is able to understand in the aggregate the grand work he is accomplishing for nature, and why he fills a place in the great ocean of life. This principle of self-preservation is a stimulant, creating activ life, which if denied to animation would also debar all inheritance of intellectuality, making all nature a blank.

An individual bee at work in the hive seeks only its natural requirements, but guided by a principle of intelligence, unknown to itself, it works in unison with others in the colony, and how grand is the result in the aggregate! The coral insect, though but a minute creature of life, in seeking self-preservation labors with the millions of its kind, and though its life is but momentary, note how from year to year, and century to century, they continue dilligently at their colossal works. In this way the coral reefs, from a carbonate of lime deposit, hav been reared along the Florida coast, and islands of considerable extent hav been formed in defiance to the dashing waters of the ocean, by the long-continued diligence of these short-lived little insects. Whence the intellectuality that guides these instinctiv natures to accomplish so much in the world's development?

But here it would not be out of order to state that these minute creatures occupy a more extensiv range than doubtless has generally been supposed; and perhaps all the various operations of chemical affinity might reasonably be ascribed to the labor of infinitesimal insects unknown to the eye of man. In relation to this, however, I would say that of late we hav made some extensiv and interesting microscopic observations, and that the public may hav some of the benefits of our researches, we will extent an idea, truthful to the letter, however fictitious it may appear to some of our readers. In presenting this idea it would be only philosophic to state that all the material in the universe is composed of particles or atoms. But in seeking to find these ultimate particles with the most powerful lens, we fail to reach them, but we find our way, in whatever material we select, lined and blockaded with innumerable animalcules, from those of the larger sizes to the most minute infinitesimals, then blending into what appears a continued mass of infinitly small animated creatures or insects. These observations were taken under the most favorable circumstances, and my companion asserted that in all reason all the ultimate atoms were virtually animated identities. It is certain, as far as our demonstrations could go, we found nothing else, and the inference was strong in favor of his conclusion. But it is difficult to get the faintest idea of the ultimatum from all we can get in a microscopic view. The comparison would be like unto pumpkins, potatos, and mustard seed, mixed in one grand batch. The pumpkins we can see, the potatoes guess at, and the mustard seed we shall never know anything about. The latter proportionately would be like magnifying a particle of sunlight, and that is too delicate for me, hence I will stop as others hav done, where nature proclaims, "So far thou shalt go and no further."

'Tis ours to fancy but not understand
A world of beings on a grain of sand,
And doubtless some there seeking to explore
A mammoth cave or some far distant shore.
'Tis ours to view ten thousand orbs afar,
And state the distance to the dimmest star;
Survey the planets, weigh them and control,
But not to analyze the human soul.

The forgoing we hav presented in order that the mind of the reader may fully realize the infinit minuteness of the particles of all material substance, and also that the largest things in the universe are productions of actual growth, the composition of which is a multiplication of infinitesimal atoms, the existence of which is known, yet beyond the power of man to find. Again, in showing the worlds beneath us and the worlds above us, it is our object to impress this principle upon the mind: that magnitude can only be considered in comparison to the mind that considers it. The sphere in which man acts makes things around him appear of certain dimensions, and distance also proportionately corresponds with his nature. But what do the thousands of animalcules, living and sporting in their boundless ocean, the aqueous fluid of a person's eye, know of the infinitude of space outside? Or, in the way of illustration, what if the earth were an intellectual being (which in my judgment it is), and we but parasites, digging and biting and frolicking upon her back, with what insignificance we would be regarded by such an immense being, and what more would she know of us than we of the little creatures beneath the ability of our eyes to discern? And again, time or duration is a principle in its nature never varying yet adapted to the appreciation of any existence of thought, proportionate to the sphere and requisitions such existence or being demands. To the minute insect, whose lifetime is but for an instant, to the realization of its identity, it may appear an age, while the duration of our lifetime to a planetary being might be regarded as a second of time is realized by us.

In the formation and development of plants and solar systems, it is a process requiring great duration, but it is hardly probable that all the planets in any solar system ever originated at once, but are born, develop, mature, and perish, one by one, analogous to the origin and growth of the species, and thus from generation to generation are perpetuated. It is doubtless a fact that the space occupied by our solar region between and around the planets in a state of development contains a sufficient amount of gaseous fluid to compose as many more heavenly bodies as are now flying in their elliptical orbits around the sun, but in order to perpetuate the existence of this great family it is essential that new generations should gradually arise to take the place of the older planets which are continually passing away; consequently it is absolutely necessary that nature should keep in reserve a sufficient quantity of rarefied material to answer the requirements. It might be questioned where the worn-out, or rather the dead, planets go when no longer useful for nature's purpose. We would answer in all reason that they go to the great source from which the material of their composition was radiated, the sun, in accordance with the law of nature's just compensation, for obviously the labor assigned for the sun to perform is to supply the solar space with the new and refined material for the sustenance of the old planets and the formation of new, consequently planets as they are developing continue to run in their orbits, but at every circuit made arrive a little nearer to one of nature's great heavenly tombs. The progress is slow but sure, and it is only a matter of time when each in turn shall be swallowed in as food for the sun.

In the formation of new planets these little children of the solar system are subject to many misfortunes. Often it occurs that a nucleus commences in such close proximity to some partially developed planet that the attractiv force of the greater body receives the lesser at a very early stage of its existence. Specimens of this kind frequently come to the earth in the form of meteoric showers, or in a more dense condition of stone. Perhaps there are many of these infant formations in the limits of this solar system at the present time, and yet possibly not one out of ten thousand will ever develop. In the progress of a planet's growth no doubt many burst in the heavens and resolve back into their former condition of nebular fluid, while others more nearly developed are subject to the most terrible volcanic eruptions and convulsiv commotions that the mind is able to conceive. The earth shows signs of such in every mountain range on her surface, and still she belches forth her fire and smoke from time to time from her numerous volcanoes.

Upon the principles of philosophy no planetary nucleus can form and develop except where in the economy of nature it will be needed in the heavens to assist in keeping order and harmony. It is plain to understand that in the formation of a heavenly body, it would receive all the material adjacently surrounding that its attractiv force is capable of collecting, and its attractiv force is increasing in proportion to its volume and weight. Hence any density in the heavens, aside from the planets, must be sufficiently foreign from them to justify an amount of material adequate to build up a body large enough for practical utility to nature else the work will be counted among the buds that never blossom; for nature never works without a purpose, and this is one of the reasons why we infer that intellectuality rules the universe.

A Proclamation of Truth to the World.

The monster fraud of the world is priestcraft. This self-constituted authority hangs on the necks of the millions as a ponderous incubus; it assumes all manner of forms, and deludes the people with every sort of cajoling name. Like the quack doctor, it abounds with nostrums to suit the most fastidious, and invites its dupes to worship at some constructed shrine which hath been patented by the grand council and solemn council of humbugs and sophists; and every individual who has stultified himself and rendered his small mind so plastic that the creed-bound seal of fudge can be easily impressed thereon, and after which the soft-pated little sheep are drilled and drilled by the cunning impostors, and then their fleece comes off piecemeal to supply the idle drones with choice luxuries and fine clothes. Ha, ha! what a powerful motor is fable to make money and swindle the people out of their freeborn rights and transform them into the veriest slaves of systems founded on no other bases than that of fraud and fiction! Oh, that the blinding scales of ignorant superstition would peel off from the pitiable multitudes, who willingly bow to an imaginary idol and sustain swarms of sponging parsons, priests, etc., who claim to be the simon-pure messengers of the high sky court of mythic vacuity! Every individual should learn and not forget that every religion now in existence is an invention. No matter where or when a religion originated; it was invented by some fanatic or knave, and is now kept running on knavish principles. The large sums of money it brings to church exchequers is the lubricator of the wind machine. If the funds now used for the purpose of spreading a tissue of unmeaning impossibilities called religious faith were used to promote and better the condition of humanity during their present and only existence, how much more wise, honest, and faithful a principle would it be than grinding out the dollars by organs and windbags from an unthinking multitude, of their hard earnings, to sustain an idolatrous system of mythology, which is an insult to the age! No kind of superstition makes mankind wise. It was constructed in ignorance, and the more dense the ignorance the more solid is the fabric. Nothing weakens the old superstructure of ancient or modern paganism more than intellectual investigation into all its ramifications. Let the light of truth and reason shine on its gross absurdities, and very soon a clear insight will reveal a mass of fraud so distinct and manifest that none but the dullest of minds can fail to detect it. Every individual who is interested in modernizing the world, and making it a better world to liv in, should use every effort to root out existing superstitions and build up a grand and mighty moral and intellectual power, whose tendency should be to suppress every phase of crime, and educating the public mind to a standard of honor, truth, honesty, and thrift, whereby they are brought to understand the duties and amenities of this life, instead of unwisely looking for another, which is nothing but a delusiv dream, never to be realized. It is a mistaken idea that any sort of superstition can civilize the world. Wise and just laws, founded on a secular basis and promptly enforced, are the remedy for all illegal acts and deeds. Let every wrong be made right, and punishment inflicted right here. This is the world for judgment, and no guilty party should escape. T. WINTER.

†John A Jost,

Our sincere thanks are extended to those friends who hav kindly sent in their five dollars to help us around the world. We trust none will regret the investment. If those not having a star attached to their name will allow us to add one, we will be obliged to them. The sooner the stars are attached to every name the sooner we will be ready to start on the long journey.

DR. T. L. BROWN, of Binghamton, and W. F. Peck, of Chicago, began a debate in Binghamton, New York, June 6th. Question: "Resolved, that immortality has no foundation except in conjecture, imagination, and belief; that death ends individual life and conscious existence, and that there is no legitimate proof of individual life after the bodily form is destroyed." Affirmativ, Dr. Brown; negativ, W. F. Peck.

DR. J. L. YORK, of San Jose, will speak in Oregon and eastern Washington Territory during July, August, and September, and will leave home about the 20th of June for Astoria, Portland, Forest Grove, and points in eastern Oregon and the territory. Our people desiring to be agitated, and who will lend a helping hand in the spread of truth, will address him at Portland, Oregon, without delay.

THE July number of the North American Review will contain an exhaustiv article on Indian affairs by Carl Schurz, and a very lively one on "The Power of Public Plunder," by James Parton.

[From the Liberal.]

The Long Journey.

It is without doubt a matter of congratulation with the great body of Liberalists that D. M. Bennett has decided to take the long journey, to pass around and see earth's inhabitants. We are more than else glad that this is to be, from the fact that we ourselvs wish to know, from a reliable standpoint, the facts, truths, and relations regarding the many inhabitants that hav with us the common relations and interests of humanity. Differing as we do in all the varied beliefs and conceptions, extending into all that makes up human life in its physical, social, and mental capacities, with its degrees of perfectability, we would know something of the conditions that hav been evolved from out the long line of past experience, that hav grown in difference by conditions and culture in the diverging lines of thought and action. We know the history of wars and bloodshed caused by priest and potentate, of courts and splendor, but nought of the varied commonality of human conceptions, instincts, education, and superstition. We would know of these things from a rational and consistent standpoint, free from the bias of past belief and antagonism. Persons hav visited different countries, mingled with different people, and hav given us from their biased impulses and thoughts grown from religious tendencies. And very little instruction hav we received from them regarding the manners, customs, thoughts, and institutions of the people. But this we can expect from this visit of Mr. Bennett. His visit in Europe, portrayed in his peculiarly interesting and instructiv manner, givs us assurance that in his going round the world we shall be enriched by a clear and intelligent common-sense recital of men and things as they are. In this let us go with him in spirit, and how can we do so any better or more reasonable than to contribute as far as each and all are able the five dollars, as proof of our esteem and confidence? The proposition that every person who advances this amount will receive two or three volumes of his journey's description should attract our attention, for we can reasonably guarantee to ourselvs that it will be full of interest and instruction of a kind and definitness that we hav before been unable to attain. The Liberalist abroad, or the Infidel to the various systems of religious superstitions and bigotries, will develop a new line to estimate the varied characteristics of humanity.

[From the Sun of June 4th.]

To Improve the Human Breed.

The Institute of Heredity held a Convention at Boston last week, and the hall in which it met was well filled, by far the greater number of the audience being women. This is the society, it may be remembered, which proposes to reform the world by improving the human breed. It contends that mankind, as well as horses and cattle, dogs, pigs, and hens, can be made sounder and more perfect, of greater beauty and higher refinement, if proper care is taken to see that their breeding is in accordance with scientific laws.

The Institute of Heredity aims to produce a race which shall be strong and handsome; of vigorous bodies and healthy minds. But it chiefly concerns itself with the eradication of vice, and this it feels sure can be effected by the scientific regulation of marriages. It would get rid of vice by seeing to it that children should be born without vicious tendencies. Of course, if the offspring are to be of sound moral health, the parents must hav no leanings toward depravity themselvs. It is as reasonable to expect a kind and gentle horse to come from a balky and tricky stock, as it is to hope for children of well-ordered lives and happy moral balance when their ancestors hav been dissolute and lacking in self-control, says the Institute of Heredity.

The Institute of Heredity, therefore, is a great moral reform society in its purpose, and accordingly we find it drawing to its support some of the men and women who hav been conspicuous in other movements for the elevation of mankind or for the cure of particular social wrongs or abuses. They were radicals before, but now they are infinitly more radical, for they would destroy the seeds of all evil in the human race. The Rev. Parker Pillsbury, the abolitionist, for instance, is one of these. He said at the convention last week that he believed the principles of heredity might eventually triumph over death and the grave, as they at present exist. But Mrs. Isabella Beecher Hooker inferred from this and other remarks that there was a disposition to substitute heredity for Christianity as a means of reforming the world. She accordingly spoke warmly in behalf of Christianity, though she said she agreed with the leaders of the Institute, particularly in respect to the political equality of women. Among the prominent persons present at the meeting, we observe, were several of the most distinguished advocates of women's rights. They probably are the more ready to accept the doctrins of heredity because these recognize of necessity the essential part women must play in the regeneration of the world according to their scheme.

Of course heredity and Christianity are antagonistic. The one proposes to effect the salvation of men by scientific means, by carrying out the doctrin of selection; and the other relies only on supernatural agencies for the transformation of character. Heredity may welcome the aid of Christianity because of its pure moral teachings, but in effect it denies the efficacy of merely spiritual methods for regenerating the race. It does not hope to get rid of sin by converting the sinner, but rather by teaching men and women to so marry that their offspring shall be born with diminishing tendencies to sin. According to its theory, a converted sinner may make an unfit parent for the very reason that he needed to be converted. He has in him evil tendencies, both moral and physical, perhaps, which ought not to be propagated, and they remain, though he may hav cleansed his ways under the influence of religion. A balky horse might hav been cured by Rarey, and yet it would make a poor parent of stock, especially if it had the blind staggers.

Christianity deals only with the soul, the spiritual nature; but heredity concerns itself with both the body and the soul, and holds that the health of the one is as necessary as that of the other, and that both must be sound to produce a perfect man. In order that the race shall be regenerated, fathers and mothers must, therefore, be in thorough training in every way. It is not merely necessary that the parents shall be moral and religious, exemplary people in all respects; they must besides be physically sound and free from tendencies to disease. As Dr. Greene said in Boston: "Children cannot be strong and healthy if their progenitors were weak and de-based. Among the Greeks," he added, "marriages were contracted with a view to healthy offspring, and we should imitate their example."

Mr. Loring Moody, the secretary of the Institute, who was one of the speakers, said he had intended to open a school for the young to giv them instruction specially in regard to marriage and its obligations; but the society has not yet got so far as that. He reported, however, that favorable responses to its circular had come from all parts of the Union, and that those who had got it up were greatly encouraged. "We intend to move right forward on the line of human progress," concluded Mr. Moody. "There is a divinity in sex which will be impressed on youthful minds of coming generations. Everything will be open for earnest and sincere inquiry."

Probably, however, none of us will liv long enough to see science controling and regulating human passions and affections. Of all the forces in the universe, they hav so far proved themselvs the most unruly; and the Institute of Heredity will hav to work long and hard before it brings them into complete subjection to its views. At present we hav little hope that our young men and maidens will be docil enough to go to Mr. Moody's school to learn how to select their mates. That is a subject about which they think they are wiser than the wisest. They usually hav more faith in their own blind impulses than in all the teachings of age and experience.

Notes from California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

After a rest of twelve days in the beautiful town of Ukiah, which I described in my first letter, I started on the 13th ult. southward, down the Russian River valley. The journey to Cloverdale, thirty-one miles, was made by stage, in five hours, over a road that is anything but smooth. The ride, however, was a very pleasant one to most of the passengers, of whom there were about a dozen in the stage and on the top. Most of them happened to be Liberals. These of course were intelligent persons and good traveling companions. The only exceptions were one deaf old man, who, of course, took no part in the conversation, and two elderly Methodist ladies, who, though they said but little, while they heard the lively Liberal conversation going on around them, gave some wonderful facial expressions of an abiding faith in total depravity. They were undoubtedly thinking a good deal about hell and damnation, and the thought of these things comforted them.

The scenery along this portion of the Russian River valley is among the finest in the world. The valley, which is very fertil, varies in width from a few rods to two miles or more. It is covered with small farms that produce an abundance of grain, grass, hops, and fruit. These farms rarely change hands. The lower portion of the mountains that bound the valley on the east and on the west are covered with a luxuriant growth of timber, mostly evergreen trees, while the higher portions are covered with an impenetrable growth of chaparral, in which the bear, the California lion, and other wild animals still find shelter.

At Cloverdale the valley attains a width of several miles, and from this place on southward the whole country is covered with beautiful farms, lovely cottages, etc., and seems to be a land of sunlight, of peace, and of plenty.

Cloverdale is the northern terminus of the San Francisco and North Pacific Railroad. It is a thriving town of five hundred inhabitants. Here I took the train for Petaluma, forty-eight miles farther south. This place I reached about 4 o'clock P. M., having passed through the two large and beautiful towns, Healdsburg and Santa Rosa. Here I was met by my old friend, C. W. Hirt, one of nature's true noblemen, who took me to his beautiful home in the western suburbs of the city. On the next day, Saturday, I became acquainted with several live Liberals. Prominent among these were Philip Cowan and Freeman Parker. Too much could not be said in honor of these men. On the next day I delivered two lectures in the theater. The audiences were fair and the interest exhibited remarkable. Should I lecture there on any future occasion, I should expect the theater to be crowded.

Petaluma is a lively little city of about five thousand inhabitants. It is about forty miles north of San Francisco, and is one of the healthiest and most beautiful cities on the Pacific coast. All it lacks is a few more live Liberals. Leaving this place with feelings of regret, I returned to Modesto, my home, to make my final preparations for my grand lecturing tour across the continent. I expect to leave here on the 27th of May, and will begin my next letter with the commencement of my eastern journey.

Modesto, founded only ten years ago, is situated on the north bank of the Tuolumne river, and is a well-built town of two thousand inhabitants. Few towns of its size can boast so many fine buildings. It is situated in the midst of what seems to be a single wheat-field (fences are almost unknown around the farms here) containing many hundreds of thousands of acres, all waving in beautiful grain just beginning to ripen for harvest.

The Liberal element is quite strong here and quite aggressiv, so much so that the priests—the Lord's shepherds—hav a hard time to keep their sheep, all but the worthless "scrubs" that hav never been "graded up," from straying off into the Liberal fold. Indeed, the priests themselvs seem to hav become ashamed of their own hell, their own uncle Splitfoot, etc., of which they used to be so proud, and which they used to make so very profitable. For their support they hav come to depend more upon church festivals than, as formerly, upon the devil.

Dr. J. L. York, of San Jose, is here now, pulverizing and scattering to the winds the dry bones of old orthodoxy. He is just the man for this work. The Liberals should keep him busy.

George M. Dutcher, a famous temperance lecturer from your city, is also here holding forth—when sufficiently sober to do so—to large and enthusiastic audiences of those who hav never been otherwise than temperate, interspersed with a few "old soaks" who seem to hav joined the temperance army simply because they had "nary a dime" left with which to get more whisky. As a temperance lecturer Mr. Dutcher is a success, and is very popular. He shows the people how disgusting a thing drunkenness is, and tells them how glorious a thing temperance is. He has reformed so often that he can tell exactly how the thing is done, and can illustrate by example. Besides this, he is rendered still more popular by his wholesale adulation of a certain famous personage who was known in his own country as "a glutton and a wine-bibber." Mr. Dutcher is in good hands; let not "Mollie and the six little Dutchers" be troubled.

Yours truly, John R. Kelso.

Attention! Rev. Dr. Newman.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir:

Rev. Dr. Newman, Methodist divine, is credited by one of your correspondents, Mr. A. H. Wood, with saying of Col. Ingersoll, "There ought to be a power somewhere to close his lips and prevent him from uttering his blasphemies."

We make haste to assure the doctor that however much he may desire such a consummation he cannot be gratified, and we shall also giv certain reasons why the Colonel will be allowed to speak on, together with some other facts for his consideration.

In the first place, the good doctor must put on his thinking-cap, and as well as he can collect his scattered thoughts and fully realize that he livs in the nineteenth century. This, if he would honestly scan the horizon of his environments, would of itself be a sufficient reminder of the position he occupies. But for fear he may not carefully glean over the fields of his historical dynamics, we shall, out of sheer good will, help him to acquire more charity and a better knowledge of what belongs to his position as a man, a Christian, and a clergyman.

When we were younger than we are now we were foolish enough to imagin that a clergyman was a complete reservoir of knowledge, but latterly we hav found out that their knowledge, like their piety, is often an unknown or debatable quantity. Doctor, you are vexed with the Colonel for uttering what you are pleased to call his "blasphemies." Now we hate to say it, but we must be allowed to remark that we don't believe the reverend gentleman thoroughly understands the real meaning and bearings of the term "blasphemies." "Blasphemy is to attribute to God that which is contrary to his nature." In the United States the offense has been enlarged by statutory provision. In England it is blasphemy to revile the Established church. In Spain it is blasphemy to speak evil of the Virgin Mary. Among the Greeks it was blasphemous to use words of ill-omen.

I am aware that Dr. Newman will assume that Webster is correct when he defines blasphemy "to attribute to God that which is contrary to his nature." Now who is competent, among all the thinkers known, on which Webster based his definition, to correctly define the "nature of God?" Webster's Dictionary, like other books of its class, is tinged with a decided leaning toward orthodoxy, and it is pretty plain to me that before long we must hav a change in our dictionaries as to the meaning of many words. Dictionaries, as now edited, are entirely in the interest of Christianity. Webster informs us, as I hav just said, that in some countries it is blasphemy to speak evil of the virgin Mary. Now it can't be anything the Colonel said of this lady that wounded the gentleman's feelings, this not being a portion of the scheme that he is likely to value very highly.

The good doctor is doubtless among the number of those who so strongly desire to inject the Jewish God, Jehovah, into our Constitution. Will they insist on the injection of the Virgin Mary also? To those who have probed this matter to the bottom, and know by what means the Catholic church filched its gods from Jew and Gentile, and on this foundation reared its mighty theological structure, and as well know how the Protestant church has unblushingly filched what gods suited it from its Catholic brethren, it savors of the ridiculous to see just where the doctor would draw the line as to "blasphemy."

In his opinion, it is blasphemy to speak ill of God, because this part of the Catholic system his sect retains, but in all probability he would not except to "Infidel" remarks on the Virgin Mary, because this goddess his sect rejects. We are forced to the conclusion that his hatred of Ingersoll and desire of muzzling him is only in reference to "God" and the "holy Bible."

Here we must remind the doctor that modern thought has evolved some new ideas about "God," or possibly only revamped old ones. "God" is a word only, meaning good. It is simply a sign, a symbol, a representation to convey the idea of omnipotent power, only equal to the caliber of the person using it to conceive of. The Chinese hav their conception of "God." The Japanese also understand him in their way, and so of other nations, ancient and modern.

When a Methodist missionary goes to the Orient and tells those keen and wise people that their "gods" are childish, impotent, and fraudulent, and that his "gods" are the true ones, he not only insults their understanding, but utters what to them are "blasphemies."

Good doctor, do not forget that orthodoxy is your doxy, and heterodoxy some other man's doxy. If you revile the "gods" of the Orient, allow Col. Ingersoll the same privilege in regard to the "gods" of the Occident. Practice justness and fairness in regard to matters of mere opinion, and you will not wish to exercise any "power" whatever to stop what you call the "blasphemies" of Col. Ingersoll.

Enlarge your mind, expand your charity, soften your heart, and grasp the fact that modern science and invention hav so enlarged the boundaries of man's knowledge and acquirements, and this little planet is so well known and understood that all its peoples are becoming like neighbors toward each others, and allowance must be made more than ever for difference of opinion on religion and all other phases of social, moral, and commercial comity. And, lastly, I would remind the reverend gentleman that if he would exercise this "power" over the Colonel he cannot. He is as impotent as one of his "gods" to do harm to any one. The fangs of theology hav been extracted. The days of its imperious power are numbered, and all its champions can do is to accept the situation with all the grace they can command, and witness the reign of reason over that gloomy abstraction called faith.

Nature's Control.

BY FRANCIS D. LACY.

Dedicated to D. M. Bennett.

Say, whence that nature's wondrous power, her first projectil hurled, or where in broad eternity shall land each rolling world? Or further to infinitude probe with thy wondering soul; seek intellectual origin or trace it to its goal?

For what the sable vaults of sky, where worlds unnumbered run, and why through space so swiftly fly, incircling their sun? What is the object thus attained, as years like lightning speed, and what the ultimatum growth of nature's primal seed?

Dost through this awful realm of space, and in these worlds that roll, pervade supreme intelligence all nature to control? And does this same eternal power scorn atoms ne'er so fine, or likewise there sublimely rule with master hand divine?

Why do these worlds from atoms spring? from what controling force? For what the purpose they exist? what destiny their course? Why through these vast celestial fields do stars in luster shine, and by pulsations waft their light along their glittering line?

Do worlds by billions roll beyond the reach of mortal sight, devoid of all intelligence, yet robed with rays of light? Do they exist, yet unapplied for intellectual use? Is nature's grand economy thus squandered in abuse?

Oh, no! the object of these worlds most clearly is defined; from them arise organic life, and likewise thinking mind. The forces operating through the elements of earth create the evolutions giving animation birth.

A world without the principles of intellectal force would be a blank, unguided mass, and useless in its course. But in this great economy such planet could not roll, nor be developed into space without the inner soul.

A mind without a body at the origin would show that substance were not needed whereby other minds might grow, proving matter is eternal, self-existent, ever young, and as rich, wise, strong, and weighty as when "morning stars first sung."

Say not that man is royal, then, in intellectual sway, since but a speck of vital force thus groveling on his way; and but a product of the earth engendered by the sun, which like a bubble vanishes, and evermore is gone.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Sixteenth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I supposed I had made it plain that when I said that the scriptures taught that God was not the author of sin I meant that God did not make man sin; that he did not make Adam insufficient to overcome sin, so that he had by his infirmity to yield to it, but on the contrary that Adam if he chose could have resisted sin, and in fact it was easier to resist than to yield. To prove your position that God is responsible for Adam's sin and made him to sin you represent me as meaning that God does not bring evil or punishment upon the disobedient. You must have known that I did not mean this. As far as your texts are quoted correctly, this, with one or two exceptions, is all that they affirm, that to the sinful and disobedient, particularly to the idolaters in Jerusalem, the Lord would bring evil; not that he would make them sin and hold them responsible, but that he would bring evil or punishment upon them. I consider your list of quotations, with the single exception noted, a glaring piece of dishonesty, for it must be plain to the dullest mind that this is the meaning of the verses. It will make this plain if I quote a few of the verses exactly as you have them, "Now is the end come upon thee, and I will send mine anger upon thee. . . . An evil, an only evil, behold is come, and my eye shall not spare thee, neither will I have pity; but I will recompense thy ways upon thee. . . The sword is without, the pestilence and famine within, he that is in the field shall die with the sword, and he that is in the city famine and pestilence shall devour him" (Ezek. vii, 3, 4, 5). Is it possible that any one need to be told that the prophet uses the word "evil" as a synonym for punishment, and not at all in the sense of making them sin? He defines its meaning himself, for he describes the evil one as being "the sword without, the pestilence and famine within." Again, I copy your own quotation, "For lo, I begin to bring evil on the city which is called by my name, and should ye go utterly unpunished? Ye shall not be unpunished, for I will call for a sword," etc. The meaning of "evil" is plain enough here. Thus in all the quotations, with one or two exceptions, the word "evil" means punishment, defeat, calamity, or a kindred idea. In your desire to plausibly defend your assertions, I see you have, with your customary carefulness in quoting scripture, included as the words of Jehovah the praise Saul accords to David (1 Sam., xxiv, 17), "And he (Saul) said to David, Thou art more righteous than I, for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil."

Your opening quotation, however, the exception to which I referred, seems on a superficial glance to afford you some support. A little examination, however, will show the contrary. "I am the Lord, and there is none else; there is no God beside me. . . I form the light and create the darkness; I make peace and create evil" (Isa. xiv, 5–8). The words were addressed to Cyrus, king of Persia, who belonged to the religious sect of the Magians. They believed that light and darkness, or good and evil, were two eternal beings who were in perpetual contact, thus producing the good and evil that is in the world. There was no acknowledgment of the one supreme God who overrules good and evil to work out his praise and plans. To displace this erroneous view Jehovah says, "I form the light and create darkness; I make peace and I create evil," meaning that there was no God besides him, and that he was the author of good and permitted the existence of evil, overruling it to his own glory, as other scriptures abundantly prove.

As might have been expected, you recur to the old and exploded charge that the Lord deceived the prophets, sent them lying spirits, etc., referring to 1 Kings xxii. Common honesty and a little search in reading these and similar passages would show that the charge is entirely unfounded. The scene detailed in verses 19–24 was not an actual scene, but merely a parable, and was a polite way of telling Ahab that the pretended prophets were deceived. That it was so interpreted at that time is evident from the fact that the false prophet smote the true one on the mouth immediately after he delivered the parable. As to the language imputed to God, seeming to command the lying spirits to "go forth and do so," able scholars say that it is the idiom of the ancient Hebrew to express as a command what is merely a permission. Hartwell Horne quotes a similar construction in a verse from the New Testament, where "the devils besought Christ that he would suffer them to enter into the herd of swine, he said unto them, Go" (Matt. viii, 31). He did not command, he merely gave permission.

After the extended notice you have given to the question of the entrance of evil, you beg the question decidedly when it is retorted upon you. That certain things good in themselves are so perverted as to become evil we have no dispute—the question is why and how on your principles do they thus become evil? Why should they not have been so molded as to be always good? The biblical doctrine of sin explains what is otherwise an enigma, but you cannot adduce it as throwing any light on your side.

Of course I insist that the sun cannot shine, the rain fall, without the aid of God, or that any truth could be or thing exist apart from him. You are characteristically smart when you strive to interpret my words as meaning that there never existed individual Atheists; of course I did not mean anything of the sort. But what I meant, and I assert it again, is, to borrow the language of Prof. Tiele, that "the statement that there are nations or tribes which possess no religion rests either on inaccurate observation or a confusion of ideas. No tribe or nation has yet been met with destitute of belief in any higher beings, and travelers who assert their existence have been afterward refuted by facts" (History of Religion, page 6).

I cannot agree with you where, in the weak attempt to pass lightly over the difficulties attendant upon your principles in regard to the pangs which nature undergoes and causes, you say that intelligence is the result of organization. I do not see why it should be any more dependent upon organization than life is. Prof. Huxley and other scientists of equally anti-theological views agree that life is not the result of organization, but organization of life.

To describe an act of a supreme power in language that is not anthropomorphic is evidently not so easy as you say, for you have not done it. Try again. To speak of God's universality, immensity, his non-personality, his diffusability, his eternal presence, not only fails to describe any acts of supreme power, but some of the words strictly considered are anthropomorphic. Certainly "presence" is intensely so. But, standing on your own ground, do you not remember that the scriptures speak of God as, with the exception of non-impersonality, being this? True, they speak in condescension to the infirmities of human understanding and human language of God as having a body, but show that a human body is not meant, for heaven, the same scriptures declare, is his throne and earth his footstool. His eyes, of which scripture speaks, run to and fro over the earth, and darkness is no veil to them. His fingers spread out the heavens and his hands reach from one end of creation to another. He is incomprehensible, underived, eternal, omnipotent, omnipresent, the inhabitant of eternity. Surely he has never been interpreted to have been in the shape of a man by any one but an ignoramus—or an Infidel.

Now for some answers to your questions: "1. You [I] claim that God is anthropomorphic. How then was it possible for him to beget an anthropomorphic son?"

Christ was not in the form of man from eternity. "In the beginning was the Word; the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that hath been made. In him was life, and the life was the light of men. And the light shineth in the darkness and the darkness apprehended it not. . . . . And the word became flesh and dwelt among us." And in this connection and in reply to your third question I suppose it is no more difficult for God to prepare a body for Jesus Christ than for you or me. Of course I cannot explain the union of the divine and human in his wonderful person. Can you analyze the union of human body, soul, and spirit to form the one man? The second question, representing something of which scripture contains no insinuation, I can let pass; the fourth is perhaps of no weight in the debate; the fifth I have not time to take up now; I will refer to it again, perhaps in my next letter.

In answer to the sixth, scripture teaches that God made the primordial universe out of nothing, which renders the seventh interrogatory nugatory, refutes the eighth, and answers the ninth.

In reply to the others, the scripture represents Jehovah as self-existent from all eternity.

I am sorry that you linger so long over matters that, however interesting, are things incapable of mathematical proof, and in no wise relevant to the questions of our debate. I hope that I have not given you excuse for further digression, in this hurriedly-written letter, and that I may be presented in your next with your proofs of another proposition.

I am, Yours, etc., G. M. MAIR.

Another View of George Eliot.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: An interesting article by David Jones on George Eliot has re-awakened a few thoughts concerning that gifted woman and her somewhat erratic course.

Although it may seem like a mouse criticising a lion, yet nevertheless the tiny mouse has the same right to its little squeak as the powerful lion to his mighty roar.

For years I gave an almost worshiping reverence to that name, and what I believe to be the principles of George Eliot, but now I cannot help thinking that she was strangely inconsistent. It may be I hav misjudged her, and if so, I am very sorry, for it is very hard for me to hav an idol fall from its pedestal in my heart. Yet how are we to judge of any one's principles but by their actions? She and Mr. Lewes had lifted themselvs and the relations they sustained to each other almost above the criticism of society, and even those who most widely differed from and regretted their course gave them credit for pure motivs and a genuin love for each other.

The world, therefore, at Mr. Lewes' decease, looked to see Marian Evans sink beneath the great sorrow that had fallen upon her, or at least liv out her life devoted to his memory. And certainly if she had wished to justify those relations, and had loved Mr. Lewes so well as to hav sustained them, it was her duty to hav been faithful in death as well as in life. On the contrary, in how short a time was she united to Mr. Cross with all the forms and ceremonies pertaining to the legal institution of marriage, thus insulting Mr. Lewes and herself, and dragging the relations they had sustained to each other into the very dust! If those relations were founded upon what she believed to be the principles of true marriage, why did she giv the lie to those principles in her marriage with Mr. Cross? Why should she hav married at all? The memory of those years should hav been too sacred for that. Had she so little discernment of spiritual things that when the physical change separated them she could hope for, or experience, no spiritual reunion?

In view of these facts and other evidences gleaned from her writings, while admitting her great genius, it yet seems to me that her mind possessed an element of masculinity and materiality and was lacking in those finer intuitiv perceptions of a truly womanly nature.

It is not strange that she left no reasons for her "seeming contempt for the legal institution of marriage." How could she, when one of the last acts of her life was to conform to that institution? For marriage, considered simply as a legal institution—the letter without the spirit—I hav no regard. To my mind, that union of one man and one woman which is prompted by love and guided by reason, whether sanctioned by society or not, constitutes true marriage. For what God has joined together no man can put asunder, or render more binding upon the consciences of honorable men and women. A union entered into from any other motivs is legal prostitution, and all the laws in the world can never make it otherwise. In the present undeveloped condition of society laws are necessary to regulate these matters. In the great future, when mankind hav, through the power of all that helps to make men better, outgrown their selfish and sensual propensities and arisen to a higher plain of civilization, men and women will be a law unto themselvs, and be virtuous and honorable, not merely because it is lawful, but because it is right. It is said we should not expect great geniuses to be governed by the same standard of conduct that ordinary mortals are expected to conform to, and so say I, but not that they should hav a lower one. They should be held, or should hold themselvs, to a standard of morality and consistency as much higher as they are higher intellectually. How can they lift humanity upward to loftier truths and nobler deeds so well as by carrying out their principles in practice, and living consistently the truths they strive to teach?

"Good deeds are more than words, however fine,
And lives prove more than printed page, howe'er sublime."

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE GENEALOGY OF THE VIRGIN MARY.

In order to demonstrate the facts which these articles from the first were designed to prove, it will be necessary to glance at the silence of Mary's ancestry in the holy Bible. The following admission, from Smith's Bible Dictionary, will introduce the subject: "There is no person, perhaps (?), in sacred or profane literature around whom so many legends have been grouped as the Virgin Mary, and there are few whose authentic history is more concise. We are wholly ignorant of the name and occupation of St. Mary's parents. The evangelist does not tell us, and we do not know. She was like Joseph of the tribe of Judah, and of the lineage of David (Ps. cxxxii, 2; Luke i, 32; Rom. i, 3). She had a sister named, probably, like herself, Mary (John xix, 25), and she was connected by marriage (Luke i, 36) with Elizabeth, who was of the tribe of Levi and the lineage of Aaron. This is all we know of her antecedents." And much more, permit the ungodly woman to add, than we know of her antecedents, for it is not true that the Bible states anywhere that she was "of the tribe of Judah and of the lineage of David." The references to Psalms and Romans are far-fetched, and the one in Luke is by no means proof that Mary was in the line of David, but was simply a statement that "God shall give unto him [Jesus] the throne of his father David," which was false, as he never sat on the throne of David or any other throne, according to the record. Such are the miserable subterfuges to which the doctors of divinity are forced to resort in order to make the least show of the fulfilment of prophecy in the history of "our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

Now it had been prophesied that Jesus should descend from the seed of Abraham, the tribe of Judah, and the house of David, and that a great deliverer like Moses should thus be born to redeem the Hebrews from their enemies. But Jesus in no wise fulfilled these alleged prophecies. It would seem very strange that while such marked carefulness should be exercised in tracing the lineage of Joseph, who was the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus (Matt. i, 16), no mention is made of the lineage of Mary. If Mary was the only human parent, and Joseph but his step-father, we should suppose that the utmost caution and precision should have been observed in the tracing of the only human parent, Mary. But what do we find instead? An utter disregard of her pedigree, and Joseph's reckoned twice, once each by Matthew and Luke, the discrepancies between the two being so wide and numerous as to preclude all possibility of reconciliation on any reasonable rules of harmony. The limit of this series will not admit of specifying these contradictions or pointing out their several fatalities, but rather to prove the various methods of harmonization attempted by the chosen ones of God. Sufficient is it to say their fancied reconciliations are as diverse as are the distinctive sects of Christianity, and require an infallible thermometrical umpire to decide the dispute among them.

The object of this review is to show that Mary as the mother of any child, divine or otherwise, was not considered of sufficient importance to draw the least attention to herself till all traces of her lineage were lost, provided she ever existed—a likely story, if she was chosen, as represented, to be the mother of God or of the son of God! It would have made no difference to what tribe Joseph, the reputed father, belonged, but all difference that it should have been ascertained beyond a doubt that Mary, the mother, had a straight record. The very absence of such care shows at once that the whole story of the immaculate conception was a farce of the most flagrant kind, an imposition not to be tolerated to-day for one moment by rational men and women. Such care is used to state, when Joseph went to be taxed, that "he was of the house and lineage of David," instead of "they were of the house and lineage of David," as to leave no doubt in the mind of any unprejudiced reader that at the time that account was written there was no intention of forcing the conclusion that Mary was of the house of David and tribe of Judah, else there was no belief of an immaculate conception or that the child was other than the son of Joseph, but that the whole story was an afterthought, the fabrication of designing priests, who desired to deify their leader and give him preëminence over all other gods, as they declared (John iii, 17) he was the only begotten son of God.

Pardon this digression, but it would seem useless to make any note of Joseph's genealogy and thus ignore that of Mary and the Holy Ghost, since they were the real parents of the child Jesus, and "Joseph was but the husband and reputed father to protect the virgin while the child was being begotten and to care for them during his infancy and boyhood." Such deliberate and improbable departures from truth in explanation of the texts of the Bible should be seized upon by the opponents of revelation, and such discords rung in the ears of the astute commentators as to force them to abandon for very shame such weak, contemptible, and inconsistent supports of a scheme of salvation whose stepping-stone is not only merged in obscurity, but so contradictory, improbable, and impossible of reconciliation as to require still greater impossibilities to harmonize it, yea, miracles so vile, gross, and revolting that even the gods of the pagans are preferable. Take such pains to reckon the genealogy down to Joseph, and then deny that Joseph was the father of the son, of whom prediction claimed his ancestry should come, while the only alleged earthly parent is forgotten and her pedigree left in obscurity and doubt for commentators and learned divines to "suppose" and "guess" over like a school-boy at his lessons! Her being the cousin of Elizabeth, who was of the tribe of Levi, proves nothing, but rather the reverse, as it shows that at least on one side she was not of the tribe of Judah. Smith, in his Bible Dictionary, again resorts to "probabilities," saying, "Mary, the mother of Jesus, was in all probability the daughter of Jacob, and first cousin to Joseph her husband." He knows nothing about it. There is not one word in the Bible to justify any such "probability." He continues: "But besides these main difficulties, as they have been thought to be, there are several others which cannot be passed over in any account, however concise, of the genealogies of Christ. The most startling is the total discrepancy between them both and that of Zerubbabel in the Old Testament (1 Chron. iii, 19–24). In this last, seven sons of Zerubbabel, not one bears the name, or anything like the name, of Rhesa or Abiud; and of the next generation, not one bears the name, or anything like the name, of Eliakim or Joanna, which are in the corresponding generation in Matthew and Luke. Rhesa is in fact not a name at all, but is the Chaldee title of the princes of captivity. It is very probable, therefore, that this title should have been placed against the name of Zerubbabel by some early Christian Jew, and thence crept into the text."

Bigoted, deluded man! to attempt to reconcile two contradictory genealogies and a third contradictory account in Chronicles with the two in Matthew and Luke, after having admitted that "both are the genealogies of Joseph, i. e., of Jesus Christ, as the reputed and legal son of Joseph and Mary," and then deny that Joseph was the father of Jesus! What earthly or heavenly difference could it or can it make, if Joseph was not Jesus's father, what his genealogy was in reference to Jesus? It is not the genealogy of Joseph we are after, but Jesus's; and if the Holy Ghost was his father, only through his earthly parent and mother, Mary, can we obtain his genealogy, so why all this care about Joseph's ancestry, and indifference in regard to Mary's in the unerring sacred scriptures? What care we for Dr. Smith and the sixty-six other divines concerned in compiling that celebrated dictionary? They affirm that both genealogies are Joseph's; then pray where is Mary's? Other no less eminent divines pretend to know that the genealogy in Matthew is Joseph's and that in Luke Mary's, though the infallible record positively asserts that both are Joseph's, as Dr. Smith affirms. The latter states, in absence of the least biblical authority, according to Grotius, that "Matthew's genealogy is Joseph's as legal successor to the throne of David. St. Luke's is Joseph's private genealogy, exhibiting his real birth as David's son, and showing why he was heir to Solomon's crown." What if it is, or what if it is not? What has all or any of that to do with establishing the descent of Mary, of whom was born "the Christ" in fulfilment that he should come of the seed of Abraham, the tribe of Judah, and the house of David.

Jamieson, in his Commentary, says: "It is clear that the genealogy here given [Matthew] is not that of Mary, but of Joseph; nor has this ever been questioned. And yet it is here studiously proclaimed that Joseph was not the natural but only the legal father of our Lord. His birth of a virgin was known only to a few; but the acknowledged descent of his legal father from David secured that the descent of Jesus himself from David should never be questioned."

But in regard to Luke, he seems to be in great doubt, putting the important question, "Have we in this genealogy, as well as Matthew's, the line of Joseph, or is this the line of Mary? a point on which there has been great difference of opinion and much acute discussion." He then goes into a close examination of all the conflicting statements, his admissions entirely contradicting his conclusions "that Joseph's name is only introduced instead of Mary's in conformity with the Jewish custom in such tables," consoling himself and us with, "However we decide [whether it be Joseph's or Mary's genealogy], it is a satisfaction to know not a doubt was thrown out," etc. He says, "Perhaps this view [that it is Mary's] is attended with the fewest difficulties, as it is certainly the best supported." What a questioning of the true meaning of God's word!

Smith attempts to patch up a reconciliation in regard to Matthew reckoning twenty-eight generations from David to Christ, while Luke makes forty-three, but utterly fails. And even if he did not fail, of what use would it be in tracing the pedigree of Mary, since he asserts that neither of the two are hers, but both Joseph's? He asserts, further, that "either the chronology or the genealogy is wrong;" for with all his ingenuity he cannot make time and dates tally any better than he has names and numbers. He evidently is not satisfied with his own explanation, and certainly he does not satisfy philosophical critics, for all rules of correct judgment are set aside and every principle of historical evidence violated to bolster up a pet dogma on which is established the Christian religion. Fraud and evasion, gospel "reasoning," and the evidence of things not seen (faith) are the foundation stones of this "glorious scheme of salvation," which is presented to the world through the divine son of God, born of the Virgin Mary, for acceptance and redemption from everlasting punishment at the left hand of God forever and forever.

Well, well; let these divines and professors struggle on to reconcile God's infallible word, and continue to denounce and persecute us heretics, Infidels, and scoffers, as they are pleased to term us; we can afford to sit and smile at their credulity and ignorance. But should they succeed in getting their God into the national Constitution, then will they bind us hand and foot; and whoever has the temerity to write, publish, or read such strictures as these will be cast into the Christian inquisition in these United States, the land of the free and the home of the brave. Then let us be up and doing, for the days of our tribulation draw nigh if power be placed in the hands of these modern Jesuits to revive the bloody persecutions and tortures of former ages.

The Religion of Truth.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Religion, from the standpoint of the Christian, so-called, is to burden the innocent and unoffending with another's shortcomings. But the religion of nature, reason, justice, and love indicates that each and every one must suffer the penalty attached to all violated law for themselvs, and the religion of truth not only indicates that this is inevitable, but more, that nature, reason, justice, and love are the only methods whereby truth can vindicate its claims, as being superior to all else in the economy of life; therefore in recognizing the claims of truth we make our best bow to the noblest, truest, purest, and best attributes of the soul; and our respect and reverence for its claims indicates our development in harmony with the laws of progressiv evolution, he or she only being comparativly perfect in thought and action who has mastered or overcome all desire to do contrary to the claims of truth in any direction.

The prayer of action implies sincerity in conviction as well as aspiration, and the fruit it bears will be in harmony with the degree of perfect adaptation of means to ends.

If we seek to build a better order of life and society, our activities will be more in harmony with the claims of truth pertaining to the needs of the human soul.

"What are those needs?" is a question that the honest investigator is ever asking. We answer, The power to unfold its every attribute in harmony with innate or natural capacity.

"How can this be accomplished?" asks the social scientist. We answer, By doing unto others just as you would hav them do by you under all circumstances, conditions, and relations.

But, says one, "This is next to impossible as society is now organized." We admit it.

Then is it not all the more necessary that you go to work and help reorganize it more in harmony with the claims of nature, reason, justice, love, and truth?

"But this is easier said than done," says a third.

While we admit this to be also true, it is an old adage that "where there's a will there's a way." And you must admit that the will power in the soul is the motor force that finds out the way to accomplish its designs or desires.

"But," says still another, "although society is made up of homogeneous elements they are heterogeneous in their manifestations, and will not come together in harmony with the claims of reason, justice, love, and truth."

This is more the result of ignorance as to what their claims really are than any perversity of tendency.

"But," says still another, "the Golden Rule cannot be made available where there is no corresponding order and law in society."

Then go to work and remodel the law and order of society to meet its demands, commands, and possibilities.

"But," say one and all, "that is easier said than done."

This we cheerfully admit, but can it not be done when leading minds, who recognize its claims, are willing to assume the position that nature designed they should occupy, viz., fill that niche in society that in harmony with innate or natural capacity they can be of the most use, because enabled to do more and better work there than in any other field of activity or necessity?

This natural adjustment of the life forces, as well as the mental, moral, and spiritual activities, will form a nucleus around which others could revolve, just as the planets belonging to our solar system do, viz., revolve on their own axis or individuality at the same time that they revolve around this nucleus or sun, so-called, because the center of light or intelligence.

"But," says one, "all highly unfolded minds are not willing to renounce the world and liv for truth and truth alone." Which indicates that their mental capacity, moral accountability, and spiritual enlightenment are not unfolded in harmony with truth's immutable law, therefore "they are weighed in the balance and found wanting" in the requirements of "the Golden Rule," therefore do not worship at truth's sacred shrine, the only altar at which the truly religious devotee can kneel and reasonably expect to be saved from either sorrow and suffering in this life or any other.

JULIA C. FRANKLIN.

THE chaotic state of opinion on religious questions is simply the result of the breaking up of the Christian system. Intelligence, being thrown upon its own resources to find a path over heaps of ruin, looks in every direction for an issue out of the falling city. Spiritualism, Materialism, Atheism, Positivism, Sentimentalism, of every mode, fanaticism of every phase, mark the efforts that are making to overleap, burrow under, dig through, blast away the piles of ignorance, dogma, tradition, that cumber the ground. They are efforts of the human mind to come to an understanding with things as they are.—O. B. Frothingham.

Discussion.

Our Seventeenth Letter to Mr. Mair.

MORE ABOUT GOD.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: You are sorry because I "linger so long" over the matters of our last few letters. Let me say I do it for your benefit and the benefit of our readers. I wish to expose the absurdities you believe in, and to show you and our readers what is right and rational to believe, and what is right and rational to disbelieve. If things or theories are incapable of "mathematical proof" and all other kinds of proof they should be discarded, and people should no longer be consigned to hell for not believing them, neither by your nondescript God, nor by his ten times ten thousand designing, selfish, lying priests.

The world is commanded to believe in God, but nobody can tell us what God is nor where he is. Nobody in the world knows the first thing about him, yet poor, ignorant men, women, and children are required to believe in him or burn in hell forever. You preach up this God and wish me to accept him or it. I have asked you to tell me what God is, and just what you know about him. You evade my questions, and give me no answer. You dodge and evade many things that ought to be made clear if they must be believed.

All that exists is something. Nothing has no existence. Something, or matter, is found in many forms. We see it and test it in granite, in iron, in clay, in wood, in water, in air, in oxygen, in hydrogen, and in the lightest ether We can also test and study the subtle forces of nature, inseparably connected with matter, among which may be named light, heat, electricity, magnetism, chemical affinity, gravitation, etc. These are all proved to be realities, and we can rationally believe in them. We know that sunshine exists, because our senses, or some of them, take cognizance of it. We know that moonshine is, for the same reason, though by general consent it is admitted to be extremely "thin." But what shall we say of that something or nothing we are called to believe in and bow down to that has not, so far as we can learn, one-thousandth part of the tangibility of moonshine?

I repeat that whatever exists is something, and can be tested. That which is not something, and does not belong to something, is nothing, and has no existence. It is wrong for the human race to longer allow vagaries, chimeras, and moonshine nothings to take possession of their minds and lead them astray. Nothing should be accepted and believed in which nobody knows anything about and of which nothing can be learned. Let all airy nothings go with the delusions of the past.

Yes, if I am correct, God is something or nothing. If he is something, those who pretend to know so much about him, including yourself, should be able to give us some tangible facts about him. If he is nothing, the quicker we drop him the better.

The rise of the belief in gods in the minds of ignorant man, in primitive times, and the forming of gods by different nations, have been sufficiently dwelt upon. You readily discard all these conceptions save the Jewish conception. I have advanced further, and discovered that that also has been as crude and as unproved as all the others. But it is with this Jewish conception that we have still a little more to do.

You are very loth to yield the point that this Jewish conception is the author of evil, though I have shown you that what purports to be the very word of this God says, "I create evil," "I frame evil," "I devise evil;" "Shall there be evil, and I have not done it?" etc. These are assertions which the Jew book says its God made. They are either true or false. It matters not who the statements were made to. Did your Jewish God make them? If he did, or if you believe he did, you are bound to accept them. He does not raise the pretense that any devil or any other being had anything to do with creating or forming evil. It is time, then, to let the origin of evil rest with your God.

But you still try to evade, and say God is not the author of sin, while you admit that he is the author of the author. What is the difference whether he is the author direct or got up another being who is the author? He is just as much the author in one case as the other. If man had infirmities and tendencies to wrong, God made him so. If he was liable to err, God made him so. If he became a victim to the wiles of the devil, God made him so and made the devil in the first place, and all with the full knowledge of just what the result would be. If God, as you believe, did all this, he alone is responsible. If God did not want man to sin by eating his apples he should not have made man with an appetite for apples, and should not have made the apples and placed them before him. If you are a parent, and have a darling child, and place within its reach a gilded toy filled with a powerful fulminate or nitro-glycerine, which as soon as seized and pressed would explode and blow your darling into "smithereens," you would be a thousand time worse than your child. What nonsense, what absurdity, for you to claim that you had told the young child not to touch it, and that it would be a sin if he did touch it! If you placed it within his reach, knowing that he would touch it and that he would be blown to shreds, you would be guilty of murder, and all the senseless palaver about "sin" and "moral agency" would not amount to a pinch of snuff.

What better were Adam and Eve than little children? They had just been made; they had no experience; they knew nothing of knowledge; they did not know it grew upon trees in the shape of apples; they knew nothing of good or evil; they had received no education; there is no account that God said a word to the woman about not eating the apples, nor that the devil or the snake said anything to the man; but God had made all the factors, he had prepared all the conditions, he knew just how the whole would terminate, and is responsible for all. He was decidedly the cause of evil, especially when he has since emphatically declared that he creates, frams, and devises evil, and does not say a word about any other being having anything to do with its origin. If you try to evade this and to claim that God is not the author of evil you only make your God a liar.

It is, however, a saddening thing that intelligent people like yourself will still hang on to that silly old fable about knowledge growing on trees, about life growing on trees, about God not wanting his man and woman to have either knowledge or life; about the snake talking human language and being able to thwart God. It is altgoether too frivolous and silly for any sensible man or woman to regard. It would be far better to study the realities of nature than to be filling your mind with worse than childish Jewish fables imported from Babylon. In this advanced age of the world it is high time for the silly theological nursery tales of thousands of years ago to be laid aside and the truths of science taken in their place. It is time to discard as divine revelation the senseless stories in an old Jewish book and give our attention to the real revelations of science and truth. It is just as sensible to believe that old Mother Hubbard, when she "went to her cupboard to get her poor dog a bone," held actual conversation in human language with her dog, as to believe that old Mother Eve held conversation with the snake when she went to the apple-tree to get an apple. It is just as reasonable to believe that the dogs and lions and asses in Æsop's fables spoke human language as that the big snake in this Jewish fable spoke human language. There is just as much proof of the one as the other; and just as much proof that one is true as the other. Yes, it is about time that you and others threw fables aside and accepted something in its place far more sensible and truthful.

You can get little consolation from reverting the question of the origin of evil upon me and my system of belief. I do not believe in the existence of evil in the Bible or Christian sense. I regard all the material in the universe to be eternal in its nature, never having been created, and that everything in the reach of man is good or evil according to the use made of it, and which facts he inevitably learns by experience. There seems no difficulty or unreasonableness in this view, no necessity for gods or devils to explain it.

Of course you can "insist that the sun cannot shine, the rain fall, without the aid of God," just as you might insist that twice two cannot be four, and that the whole cannot be equal to two halves without God, but that does not make it so. It is the hight of absurdity and falsehood to attribute to your very thin moonshine God any fact, phenomenon, or truth of nature. We know that nature exists; we can test it and prove it in thousands of ways, and her truths are realities that can be demonstrated; but your imaginary moonshine God you neither know anything of, nor does anybody else. When I ask you what he is, where he is, and what you know about him, you have not an intelligent word to say. But it is in vain for you to attempt to "ring in" the simple phenomena of nature as the work of your Jewish, phantom, moonshine God. An apple can fall from a tree and a man can roll off a log without the help of this imaginary Jewish God. He may help you write, but I am quite sure he does not help me. If you write with greater intelligence than myself it is perhaps because your phantom God helps you. If I am a little deficient, then, perhaps I am excusable.

No, I am not particularly "smart" in setting you right by stating that there are nations or tribes in Africa to-day who have no conception of a God, and no word in their language to apply to such a conception. I simply stated a fact, and as you do not deny my statement, I need not now look up the proofs establishing it. If you or Prof. Tiele know the statements of Livingston and other African travelers to be untrue, let it be shown. But really it makes little difference what totally ignorant tribes of savages may have conceived five thousand years ago, or what they may be conceiving to-day. The opinions of learned, sensible men are vastly more important.

Yes, I say, intelligence is the result of organization. Organization and life go together, and by nature's laws are produced together. There is nothing supernatural about them. The form of matter called protoplasm, containing some half a dozen simple elements, combines with the forces of nature, including light, heat, electricity, modifications of moisture, etc., and produces organization and life—vegetable, animal, and human. And where life and organization are there is sensation, mind, intelligence, more or less perfect, according to the organization producing it. Indications of it are seen in some forms of vegetable life. Flowers turn to the sun, some unfold their petals in the morning, some in the evening; tendrils reach for objects to cling to for support; some plants seize and hold their animal victims, which seem to be absorbed and assimilated into the vegetable organization. These phenomena indicate a low grade of intelligence, but this intelligence is far more marked in the animal kingdom. It is of a low grade in the oyster, in fishes, in insects, but it is there, and always in proportion to the organization producing it. In ants, bees, dogs, foxes, horses, elephants, etc., intelligence is far more apparent than with many other animals, which is because the organization producing intelligence is more perfect in some cases than others. It is the same with the human race, which exhibits the highest order of intelligence, because it has the highest class of organization, and in which we see a great diversity in character of intelligence, and for reasons of difference in organization. Until the organization can be found which produces the intelligence which you attribute to your God it is nothing short of absurdity to claim that the intelligence exists, especially unless it can be shown that intelligence exists without an organization.

I have endeavored to answer your inquiries with as much directness and fairness as possible, though you seem to lightly appreciate my efforts. But what am I to say of your replies to my questions? Can I give you credit for fairness and honesty? I wished you to explain how a non-anthropomorphic infinite God or being could beget an anthropomorphic son; how an invisible, impalpable, unlimited, unlocal, universal infinitude could produce an offspring having the human form, with the parts and organs of a man, who could occupy but a single point in the universe at a time, and seemed just as human and earthly as any other man; but your answer is evasive and unsatisfactory. You quote the unmeaning verbiage attributed to John about the "word," which was evidently written to introduce into Christian theology the Platonic or Grecian philosophy about the logos, or word, and to establish the doctrine of the trinity, and most assuredly was not written till one hundred and fifty years after Jesus. What the book of John says upon this subject is wholly unlike what is said by other canonical gospel writers. And as John has not a word to say about the interview between God or his partner, the Holy Ghost, and the Virgin Mary, as he has not a word to say about Jesus being begotten in any manner, as he even has nothing to say about Joseph's dreaming out the way in which the process was accomplished, as he evidently knew nothing about the interview between God and the virgin, he is clearly an incompetent witness or authority to make the explanation as to how the infinite could hold commerce with a finite person, and how the finite could be the natural offspring of the infinite. Neither Matthew, Mark, nor Luke gives us the slightest indication that Jesus was God and existed millions of years before he was begotten. From the first three gospels we are led to infer that Jesus was begotten, gestated, and born into the world a little puling infant, with the parts and passions belonging to every infant so born. Not a word is said about his being the "word, the logos," or about his having a previous eternal existence. If the three told the truth, John told a falsehood, and vice versa.

If he was the Son of God before he was born into this world, we should be told who his mother was the first time. If there are goddesses in the celestial regions to bear the children of the gods, as the Grecians used to believe was the case in Olympus, John or Matthew, or some of those who did God's writing for him, should have told us something about it. But as they are all as silent as the grave on the subject, we are left to infer that the Jews and Christians have no goddesses, and the mystery remains unsolved. How Jesus or Christ could have become a son the first time, admitting John to be correct, is very doubtful. Truly, the mystery of godliness exceeds all human understanding.

Yes, I must say your attempt to explain how a vague, indefinite, unreal, unrecognized infinitude or non-anthropomorphism can beget or produce a definite, organized, bona fide, real, solid, anthropomorphic son is a failure. John does not explain it at all, and I don't believe he knew anything about it—in fact, just as little as yourself. There is indeed a great mystery in this theological enigma how an invisible spirit, gas, vapor, essence, or whatever your God may be, could hold connection with a young maiden, and how a healthy, well-developed son should be the result. I perceive that you are very unwilling to admit that this connection was of a sexual character, and you are almost offended to have such a suggestion thrown out. In this you are evidently wrong. As nothing of the animal or human kingdom was ever begotten save by the use of sexual organization; as God is the deviser and creator of the process, if he is the deviser and creator of anything; as all the other gods which have filled the minds of men before and since have resorted to this process, it is only rational that your God should be no exception to the general rule, and you have no authority to adduce that it was not so. But how nothing and something could enter into the work of propagation is a blank, unexplainable, unreasonable inconsistency. Truly, the entire system of theology is a muddle of the direst and most senseless absurdities.

Your attempt to apologize for the language applying organs and parts to deity when he possesses none presents neither consistency nor honesty, to my perception. I must again insist that it is nothing less than falsehood to talk about God's head, eyes, nose, mouth, ears, arms, hands, loins, legs, feet, and back parts if he has none, and the use of such terms does not express infinity, or the boundless something that you conceive God to be. It is most clear that those who used those terms in describing their god twenty-five hundred years ago thought he possessed those organs and parts; and now if you and others find it necessary to drop those crude notions, and recreate your god, you have an inconvenient mass of absurd falsehoods to dispose of. The pretense that those terms were necesssry to convey the idea of omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence is simply untrue.

I wish to say a few words about an explanation you attempted in your previous letter as to how the devil was able to show Jesus all the kingdoms of the world from the top of an exceeding high mountain in Palestine, and which I omitted in my last. Your explanation seems to me evasive and false. The language of Matthew is, "All the kingdoms of the world," and the revised New Testament, which claims to be faithful to the original, uses the same words. It is evident that the person who wrote that statement meant the whole world, and not the little country of Judea. That story was written before it was known that the earth is round, or that there is no mountain from which all the world can be seen. To try to save a falsehood by saying that the kingdoms of the "land" was meant is quite "too thin." I cannot think you are honest in this, as you have no authority for saying that only the land at the foot of the mountain was meant; but it is a fair sample of nearly all your explanations of the absurdities and falsities in your system and creed.

There is an evident falsehood in the story besides the one of seeing all the world from any one point, high or low. The statement is that the devil took Jesus up into an exceeding high mountain, and showed him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. This is positively false, for there is no "exceeding high mountain" in Palestine. It is a mountainous country, it is true, but there are no high mountains in it. There is no mountain in it fourteen hundred feet higher than its principal city, Jerusalem, and that is 2,610 feet above the Mediterranean sea. The Mount of Olives is 2,724 above the sea, Neby Samwil is 2,650; Bethel, 2,400; Sinjil, 2,685; Ebal and Gerizim, 2,700; Tabor, 1,900; Safed, 2,775; and Jebel Jurmul, 4,000. (Smith's Bible Dictionary.) So the very highest peak in the whole country is only about one-eighth the hight of some of the mountains of the earth. How false, then, to call any of them an exceeding high mountain and how very false to pretend that from any mountain all the kingdoms of the world can be seen! This one false story may be taken as a sample of the reliability of all the Jesus story. Why did not Matthew say which mountain it was, and point out the exact place whence the view was obtained, that others might climb up and stand on the same spot, and see if from thence they could view all the kingdoms of the world and the glory thereof. It takes a good deal of spiritualizing and the lugging in of a good deal of metaphor to cover such falsehoods. It is, in my opinion, far more sensible to let the whole narrative pass as the inventions and the mistakes of a past age of ignorance and superstition. It will not bear close investigation. A great deal of faith and gullibility is necessary to accept it all and regard it as "the infallible word of God."

MORAL TEACHERS BEFORE JESUS.

I will now attempt to show that the world had good moral teachers before Jesus, that if the morals and precepts ascribed to him are true, they are not superior to what was taught before his time, and that even the very best of his moral injunctions were merely the repetition of what had been uttered by others hundreds of years before. I have not the space, however, to quote at much length, and must merely give a few passages here and there from the old sages and philosophers.

I will first make a few quotations from the ancient Vedas, believed to have been written nearly five thousand years ago. These verses are from a hymn to Indra:

1. In the beginning there arose the Source of golden light. He was the only born Lord of all that is. He established the earth and the sky. Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?

2. He who gives life. He who gives strength; whose blessing all the bright gods desire; whose shadow is immortality, whose shadow is death. Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?

3. He who through his power is the only king of the breathing and awaking world. He who governs all, man and beast. Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?

4. He whose power created these snowy mountains, whose power the sea proclaims, with the distant river. He whose those regions are, as it were, his two arms. Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?

5. He through whom the sky is bright, and the earth firm. He through whom heaven was established; nay, the highest heaven. He who measured out the light in the air. Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?

The following is addressed to Varuna:

1. Let me not yet, O Varuna, enter into the harm of clay. Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.

2. If I go along trembling, like a cloud driven by the winds, have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.

3. Through want of strength, thou strong and bright God, have I gone wrong. Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.

4. Thirst came upon the worshiper though he stood in the midst of the waters. Have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.

5. Whenever we men, O Varuna, commit an offense before the heavenly host, wherefore we break the law through thoughtlessness, have mercy, Almighty, have mercy.

These are from a somewhat later Veda:

1. Preserve thyself from self-sufficiency, and do not covet property belonging to another. The way to eternal beatitude is open to him who without omission speaketh truth.

2. All works ought to be regarded merely as means of purifying the intelligence, as means to guide the traveler to his home.

3. The foolish, plunged in ignorance, believing themselves wise, resemble the blind leading the blind; but men who have maturely considered the perishable nature of all advantages that works can procure, hermits who live in the forests upon alms, fathers of families endowed with wisdom, worshiping Brahma, preaching austerities, subduing the senses, these are delivered from all sin and ascend to the highest heaven, where reigns the immortal Brahma, as ancient as the world.

4. Though man finds pleasure in that which he sees, hears, smells, tastes, and touches, he derives no benefit from the pleasure, because the soul attaching itself to external objects forgets its high origin, which is the Universal Soul.

5. When the sage perceives the Eternal Cause everywhere present, then abandoning the consequences of good works and bad works, he becomes perfect and obtains complete absorption. The sage who recognizes that God resides in all creatures, forgets all idea of duality. He is convinced that there is only one real existence, and that is God. He directs all his senses towards God only, the origin of his own consciousness. He concentrates upon him all his love, detaches his spirit from all earthly objects by fixing his soul continually upon God. A person thus devoted lo God is esteemed the most perfect among the adorers of divinity.

6. To know that God is, and that all is God, this is the substance of the Vedas. When one attains to this there is no need of reading or of works; they are but the bark, the straw, the envelope. No more need of them when one has the seed, the substance, the Creator. When one knows him by science he may abandon science as the torch which has conducted him to the end.

The following is one of the numerous prayers of the Vedas:

When they who know the Great One go through holy rites and through piety, thither may fire raise me. May fire receive my sacrifices. Mysterious praise to fire! May air waft me thither. May air increase my spirits. Mysterious praise to air! May the sun draw me thither, may the sun unlighten my eye. Mysterious praise to the sun! May the moon bear me thither, may the moon receive my mind. Mysterious praise to the moon! May the plant Soma lead me thither, may Soma bestow on me its hallowed milk. Myterious praise to Soma! May Indra carry me thither, may Indra give me strength. Mysterious praise to Indra! May water lead me thither, may water bring me the stream of immortality. Myterious praise to the waters! Where they who know the Great One go, through the holy rites and through piety, thither may Brahma conduct me. May Brahma lead me to the Great One. Mysterious praise to Brahma!

The following are extracts from the twelve books of the Institutes of Menu, as sometimes called. They were translated by Sir William Jones, and believed by him to have been written 1,280 years B.C. Menu was the lawgiver of the ancient Hindoos, and was believed by Jones and others to be the original of Menes of Egypt, Minos of Greece, as well as Moses of the Israelites. The similarity of name and avocation gives great color to the opinion. At all events Menu was prior to all the others.

The universe existed in darkness, imperceptible, undefinable, undiscoverable, and undiscovered; as if immersed in sleep.

Then the self-existing power undiscovered himself, but making the world undiscoverable, with the five elements and other principles, appeared in undiminished glory, dispelling the gloom.

He whom the mind alone can perceive, whose essence eludes the external organs, who has no visible parts, who exists from eternity, even he, the soul of beings, shone forth in person.

He having willed to produce various beings from his own divine substance, first with a thought created the waters and placed in them a productive seed.

The seed became an egg as bright as gold and blazing like the sun with a thousand beams, and in that egg he was born himself in the form of Brahma, the great forefather of all spirits.

In that egg the great power sat inactive a whole year of the Creator, at the close of which, by his thought alone, he caused the egg to divide itself.

And from its two divisions he formed the heaven above and the earth beneath. In the midst he placed the subtle ether, the light regions, and the permanent receptacle of waters.

From the Supreme Soul he drew forth mind, existing substantially, though unperceived by sense immaterial, and before mind, or the reasoning power, he produced consciousness, the internal monitor, the ruler.

And before them both he produced the great principle of the soul or first expansion of the divine idea; and all vital forms endowed with these qualities of goodness, passion, and darkness, and the five perceptions of sense and the five organs of sensation.

Thus having at once pervaded with emanations from the Supreme Spirit the minutest portions of fixed principles, immensely operative consciousness, and the perceptions, he formed all creatures.

Then proceed the great elements, endued with peculiar powers, and mind with operations infinitely subtle, the imperishable cause of all apparent forms.

This universe, therefore, is composed from the minute portions of the seven divine and active principles, the great Soul or first emanation, consciousness, and five perceptions; a mutable universe from immutable ideas.

Of created beings the most excellent are those which are animated; of the animated, those which subsist by intelligence; of the intelligent, mankind; and of man, the sacerdotal class.

And thus it continues at great length. In Book IV. is found the following:

Let a Brahman having dwelt with a preceptor during the first quarter of a man's life pass the second quarter of human life in his own house, when he has contracted a legal marriage.

He must live with no injury, or with the least possible injury, to animated beings in pursuing those means of gaining subsistence which are strictly prescribed by law, except in times of distress.

Let him say what is true, but let him say what is pleasing; let him speak no disagreeable truth, nor let him speak agreeable falsehood—this is a primeval rule.

Let him say "well and good," or let him say "well" only; but let him not maintain fruitless enmity and altercations with any man.

Let not a man be proud of his rigorous devotion; let him not, having sacrificed, utter a falsehood; let him not, though injured, insult a priest; having made a donation, let him never proclaim it.

Single is each man born; single he dies; single he receives the reward of his good works; and single the punishment of his evil deeds.

To a man contaminated by sensuality neither the Vedas nor liberality nor sacrifice nor strict observances nor pious austerities will procure felicity.

Christna, the Hindoo savior and redeemer, taught excellent morals, from which I give a few quotations:

Men who have no self command are not capable of fulfilling their duties.

Pleasure and riches should be renounced when not approved by conscience.

The wrongs we inflict upon our neighbors follow us like our shadow.

Love of his fellow-creatures should be the ruling principle of the just man in all his works, for such weigh most in the celestial balance.

He who is humble in heart and in spirit is loved of God, and has need of nothing more.

As the body is strengthened by muscles the soul is fortified by virtue.

There is no greater sinner than he who covets the wife of his neighbor.

As the earth supports those who trample it under foot and rend its bosom with the plow, so should we return good for evil.

The virtuous man is like the gigantic banyan tree whose beneficent shade affords freshness and life to the plants that surround it.

When we die our riches remain behind; our relatives and our friends only follow us to the tomb; but our virtues and our vices, our good actions and our faults, follow us in the other life.

Christna's counsel to a disciple:

Let him devote himself each day to all the practices of pious devotion, and submit his body to the most meritorious austerities.

Let him fear all worldly honor worse than poison, and feel only contempt for the world's riches.

Let him know what is above all is the respect of himself and the love of his fellow-creatures.

Let him abstain from anger and all evil treatment, even toward animals, whom he ought to respect in the imperfection that God has assigned him.

Let him chase away sensual desires, envy, and cupidity.

Let him refrain from the dance, the song, music, fermented drinks, and gambling.

Let him never be guilty of evil speaking, calumnies, or impostures.

Let him never look at women with love, and abstain from embracing them.

Let him have no quarrels.

Let his house, his diet, and his clothes be always the plainest.

Let his right hand be always open to the poor and the unhappy, and let him never boast of his benefits.

When a poor man shall knock at his door let him receive him, refresh him by washing his feet, serve him himself, and set what remains, for the poor are the chosen of the Lord.

But above all let him refrain through the whole course of his life from whatever way molesting others; protect, love, and assist his fellow-creatures; thence flow the virtues most agreeable to God.

Do good to all, both the evil and the good, even your enemies.

Buddha, as a moral teacher, never has been excelled, and probably a life more pure has been led by no one. I can give but a small part of his moral teachings. His commandments were as follows:

1. Thou shalt not kill.
2. Thou shalt not steal.
3. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
4. Thou shalt not speak untruth.
5. Thou shalt not take any intoxicating drink.
6. Thou shalt avoid all anger, hatred, and bitter language.
7. Thou shalt not indulge in idle and vain talk.
8. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods.
9. Thou shalt not harbor envy, nor pride, nor revenge, nor malice, nor the desire of thy neighbor's death or misfortune.
10. Thou shalt not follow the doctrines of false gods.

Miscellaneous.

[From the San Francisco Argonaut.]

Robert Ingersoll's Work.

Robert Ingersoll is doing a great work. Whether it is for ill or good, there is and—within this generation at least—there will be a wide difference of opinion. Is he the successful iconoclast of a false religion, or is he vainly assailing the indestructible foundations of a true faith? Is he tearing down and destroying that which is good, and leaving a vacuum of Infidelity, or is he laying, broad and deep, the base of a new and grander structure of reason and philosophy? Is he destined to be the instrument that is to sweep away from the intellectual atmosphere the mist and clouds that obscure the sun of reason, or is he but a ribald and blasphemous ranter against truths that are imperishable? What is the secret of this man's power, that he can stir to its very depths the most intelligent communities, and bring to the reading of his books and to the hearing of his lectures some of the best minds of the country? That he is doing this every observant person must admit. In Boston or San Francisco, in New York, or at the national capital, the announcement of a lecture by Robert Ingersoll commands a large, intelligent audience. His name is more familiar today in America, and he has more open admirers than any theologian in the nation. There are men more learned and more eloquent than he, and yet there is no man of any church that, like him, is engaging the attention of thinking men. He is not original, for there is no thought that he has uttered that has not been elaborated by others; there is no fact uttered by him that has not been demonstrated by others. That he is original in his methods; that he charms by his wit, and startles by his audacity, all acknowledge. He laughs at God, makes mockery of holy things, holds up to ridicule the sacred writings, subjects every mystery to the most merciless analysis, scoffs at the most venerable traditions, denies the existence of miracles, demands that all historic truths invoked by the church or Christian believers must be affirmativly proved, sneers at all dogmas, disavows his belief in the divine character of Christ, in the authenticity or inspiration of the scriptures, and in the immortality of the soul. He declares the God of Christianity to be a creature of the church, and the church to be a mercenary industry; that the Hebraic God of the Old Testament is a monster of crime; that the Bible is an aggregation of vicious tales, of false history, of immoral teachings, and at war with science, philosophy, and reason; that the Christian church is and has ever been an evil; that it is a nursery of superstition, ignorance, and fable; that it hinders progress and keeps the world in darkness. This is the indictment that Robert Ingersoll brings to the bar of the court of public opinion, and demands that the church must make to it the plea of guilty or not guilty; that the church must go to trial upon the evidence, and that the evidence must be given under iron rules that concede nothing in favor of the accused. He denies to the Christian church the possession of previous good character, of honesty of present purpose, and thus takes away from it the presumption of innocence.

So far the religious organizations hav refused to plead; so far they hav refused to frame issues. They hav demurred to the indictment, to the jurisdiction, and to his right, as prosecutor, to arraign them. They say he is a scoffer and an Infidel; that he is guilty of blasphemous irreverence. So far as we know, no leading theological institution, and no prominent ecclesiastic has undertaken to answer the arraignment of Mr. Ingersoll. Most Christians, so far as our observation goes, hav contented themselvs with a sneer at him; with a declaration that he is an Infidel; that he proposes nothing in place of what he destroys; that he is a bad man, and is chafing against the impregnable walls of a structure that is founded upon immutable truths.

If all this is true, we ask whether the church is justified in allowing this scoffing Infidel to assault it without an endeavor to reply? Are able-minded theologians, those thinkers and scholars of the church, justified in withholding their refutations of his false and pernicious teachings? Shall they content themselvs in refusing to giv him combat, and still claim that their arsenal is filled with unanswerable weapons of arguments, offensiv and defensiv? The Christian church claims that it is a citadel and a refuge; a place, not only of safety and protection to those within its walls, but that it is indispensable to the safety of all, and that the whole world should come within its gates. Those upon the outside are watching this conflict. They see this armed knight assaulting the walls of the church with catapult and battering-ram; with clarion voice he dares them to come forth to the encounter. He charges that all within are slaves to false opinions, are manacled by ignorance, are captivs in the dungeons of superstition; that it is only on the outside that there is free air, free thought, free action, and safety. What shall we of the wicked world do and think? How shall we regard this one-sided conflict, in which the intrenched party makes no defense? We see its captains looking from the ramparts, seemingly confident in the safety of their own position; but we see no plumed and steel-clad champion come forth to giv combat to this false and clamorous knight that besieges their portals and prevents our entrance. The church cannot say that it avoids controversies, for it delights in them. It cannot disclaim its desire to avoid combats, for out of them hav come its heroes and its martyrs. Can it be that the soldiers and captains of the Christian church are not altogether confident of their position? Can it be that the thinkers and orators are not quite certain that they can meet Robert Ingersoll in debate? Can it be that the church has fallen upon degenerate days, and has lost its courage? Assuredly Robert Ingersoll is not the first, nor bravest, nor best armed, nor most courageous of the assailants who hav dared to question the truths of the Christian religion, but most assuredly he is the first who has found within the church no adversary to giv him combat. There hav been some attempts to answer him, but they hav been feeble and sporadic. It will not do to say that Ingersoll is not worthy of reply; his following is too great, and the impression he makes is too strong. The church has never failed to accept a doctrinal controversy, and it has, in its earlier history, carried these conflicts to the battle-field. Every shade of opinion that has found expression by a theologian has led to long and bitter and bloody polemical discussion.

To settle these questions of dispute, the cord, the dungeon, the rack, and the funeral pyre hav been brought into requisition. But now, when the very foundations of the superstructure are assailed, and the truth of essentials is challenged, there seems to be indifference on every side. There is a vast deal of skepticism abroad in the world. It prevails in the most civilized countries. It is most noticeable in intelligent classes. It is observable in the literature of the age. Science is no longer the handmaid of religion, but she stalks along with an independent, resolute stride, leaving religion to take care of herself. The state no longer acts as guardian to the church, and in civilized countries no longer looks to it as a nursing mother. Education becomes self-reliant, and divorces itself from religious teachings. The schools are secular and godless. Philosophy looks on theology with half-scornful indifference. Governments frame their organic laws with no God in their constitutions, and giv no aid to religion in their codes. We are not expressing opinions, we are but stating facts. We are not upholding Robert Ingersoll in his assault upon religion; we are not writing irreverently of a faith that holds in its embrace millions of intelligent minds, but we are warning the Christian church and its members, its learned clergy and intelligent laymen, that men who are their equals in learning, and their equals in the possession of all the morals, and all the virtues, and all the essentials of good citizenship, and who are as conscientious, and as honest, and as earnest as themselvs, are prospecting the Christian church to its lowest levels. They are assaying the ores of dogma, subjecting all the articles of faith to a thorough analysis, to fire-assays and practical working processes for results. If the Christian church can stand this investigation, and the Christian religion can come successfully out of this furnace of intellectual heat, it will hav fought its last battle and won its crowning victory. If it cannot do this its days are numbered. This conflict is to be fought out in the open arena. It is to be an intellectual conflict on a fair field. The weapons of science, history, philosophy, reason are open to the choice of both combatants. No fairer field than in the United States of America, no age with a better temper than this nineteenth century, and no better men and women than ours as umpires in the contest.

A New Society.

The "Association of Moralists" is the name adopted by a new society which had its inception in Hannibal, Mo. The following appeal to all earnest Liberals will explain its objects and aims:

Realizing the necessity of showing to the world that Liberalism does not mean lawlessness or immorality, as our enemies would hav them believe, but that on the contrary it is conduciv of the highest type of morality and the best interests of society, we respectfully commend to you the following constitution as a basis of organization. So far it has proven acceptable to all classes of Liberals. It does not conflict with any other Liberal organization. The existence of a deity and the future life are left open questions, and its bond of union consists of intellectual propositions instead of articles of faith. We want to extend this organization far and wide. Can you not aid us by getting together a few ladies and gentlemen and forming a local society according to this constitution? As soon as we are notified we will place your society on the roll of this association, and inform you from time to time of the progress that is being made. Address, L. L. Suydam, Chairman, Hannibal, Mo.

The constitution adopted is as follows:

ART. I. This organization at large shall be called the "Association of Moralists," and the following shall be the bond of union of its members:

(1.) We hold it to be self-evident that every rational being has a inalienable right to investigate and decide for himself all questions pertaining to his present or future welfare. (2.) We hold it to be self-evident that enlightened human reason, untrammeled by prejudice, is the highest tribunal known to man. (3.) We hold it to be self-evident that this life is a reality of duties toward our fellow-creatures, arising out of our mutual dependence, hence he who most faithfully performs these duties makes the best of this life, and therefore must be best fitted to enter into a higher state, if he is still to exist. (4.) We hold it to be self-evident that each individual of the human family, as a rational being, is under a natural obligation to regulate his conduct in all the relations of life according to those principles by which the general welfare is promoted, and to cultivate in himself and instil into the minds of others a love of truth, justice, sincerity, and charity, and a fraternal feeling toward all mankind. Therefore we hav associated ourselvs together by this bond of union for the purpose of promulgating the principles and promoting the practice of that true morality which is based on reason, honor, and humanity.

ART. II. In addition to the general purpose mentioned in Art. I., the specific objects of this organization shall be to promote social intercourse among its members; to render assistance and comfort to persons in sickness, distress, or destitution; to giv secular burial to its deceased members, and others when expedient; and to provide for and educate needy orphan children and those whose parents are in destitute circumstances.

ART. III. Any person, male or female, above the age of fifteen years, may, with the consent of a majority of the members present at a regular meeting, unite with any local society of Moralists, but no person shall be retained in fellowship who persists in immoral practices.

ART. IV. The officers of each local society shall be a chairman, a secretary, a treasurer, and three censors, who shall be elected annually; and, when practicable, a lecturer shall be employed.

ART. V. The chairman shall preside at all business meetings only. The secretary shall keep a list of the members of the society and record the proceedings of all business meetings. The treasurer shall hav charge of all funds belonging to the society, and pay all demands against it which hav been allowed by vote at a regular meeting, and report quarterly the financial condition of the society. The three censors shall constitute a board for the investigation of charges against members, with discretionary powers, but the accused shall in all cases hav the right of appeal from the decision of the board to the society. The lecturer shall hav charge of and provide, or cause to be provided, suitable entertainment for all regular meetings, except business meetings, and it shall be his duty especially to labor for the upbuilding of the society or societies under his charge.

ART. VI. This constitution shall be the fundamental law of all societies belonging to this association, and shall not be amended except by a general conference, in which each local society shall be entitled to equal representation, and each amendment must be ratified by two-thirds of the local societies.

ART. VII. Each society shall hav power to make rules for its own government, provided no such rule shall conflict with this constitution.

Is Spiritualism Atheistic?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Rev. Caverno, of Chicago, a few weeks since from his pulpit made a fierce onslaught upon Spiritualism. This brought down upon him the ire of several Spiritualists, and the clerical bigot received, through the columns of the Chicago Times, a severe overhauling at their hands. But we are now only concerned with a statement made by one of his critics, "M.," who, near the close of a lengthy article, says:

Another strange misrepresentation of Spiritualism is to call it Atheistic, as Mr. Caverno does. He speaks of a "godless universe," and "if there is no God," implying that Spiritualism denies the existence of God. Whence he derived this incorrect conception of our philosophy I am at a loss to determin. Is not the whole literature of Spiritualism permeated with Theism? Do not many Spiritualist lecturers open their meetings with prayer? Where can we find in the whole range of Spiritualism a denial of the divine existence? Deity is the central principle of the Spiritualist's philosophy. The immortality of man is predicated upon his being in essence a child of God, possessing in his inmost soul a deific germ, a detached portion of the infinit oversoul. There are a few, very few, nominally Atheistic Spiritualists, but their views are not in sympathy with the great mass of Spiritualists, or with the teachings derived from the spirit world. The expression "Atheistic immorality" embodies two gross falsehoods against Spiritualists; we are not Atheists, neither are we immoral; and I am surprised to see Mr. Caverno take the ground he does.

Is this true, Spiritualists? Is it true that "deity is the central principle of the Spiritualistic philosophy?" Has it not time and again been asserted in THE TRUTH SEEKER by conspicuous exponents of Spiritism that man's immortality is his dower from nature, independent of any and all deities? That, if he is to liv after the death of the body, it is because he is an immortal being by reason of his organization?

But not now stopping to discuss or examin this difference of opinion among Spiritualist doctors, let us look for a moment at "M.'s" assertions. This sentence is a remarkable one, and is an apt illustration of the fact that many people often make use of words and phrases of whose meaning they hav not the slightest conception, and commit themselvs to positions which are sure to drop them into a quagmire of absurdities. This is the sentence, "The immortality of man is predicated upon his being in essence a child of God, possessing in his inmost soul a deific germ, a detached portion of the infinit oversoul." If you detach a portion from infinity is the remainder infinit? How can there be an "infinit *over*soul," when there are some thirteen hundred millions of "detached portions" of him, her, or it, which exist as finite *under*souls? But stop! they too must be infinit, for we are told they are immortal; that is, infinit in duration, and they cannot be infinit in duration without being infinit in extent. But how can there exist more than one infinity? Is not the proposition unthinkable? But if these "detached portions" are finite the dilemma still remains. There cannot exist an infinit something and a finite something else. So we are logically driven to the conclusion that this "infinit oversoul" is all that exists? Is not this the position of the Atheist, that the universe is but "one stupendous whole?" Where then is your personal God? Where is your being possessing moral attributes, a belief in whom distinguishes you from the Agnostic and saves your philosophy from being Atheistic? Do you still persist in the assertion that there exists a personal, intelligent being, infinit in time and power and goodness, a "detached portion of whom each human being has hidden away in his or her inmost soul?" If so, please tell us how it happens that from this perfect being has sprung so many moral monsters? If the "detached portions" are so imperfect, how can the whole be without flaw? Is the wagon with a broken axletree a complete wagon? Is the man with a paralytic leg or an unbalanced brain a complete man? The machine is no stronger than its weakest part, and your great original god from whom all men sprang is no better or stronger than the wickedest or weakest "detached portion" who has cursed the earth with his presence. Just think of it! your "infinit oversoul," no better than Anthony Comstock! But do you fall back upon the theologian's dernier resort and say that man is not all divine, that it is his physical part which leads him into wrong doing? Then is not his material body also a portion of the "infinit oversoul?" How else can the latter be infinit? Then again is the finite superior to the infinit? Can the groveling tendencies of the body overcome the upward strugglings of the oversoul? In other words, is a part mightier than the whole?

E. C. WALKER.

Christian Falsification of History.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: If we were conversing with an intelligent foreigner from eastern Asia on subjects connected with our own history, and he should calmly assure us that we are mistaken as to the date of the discovery of America by Columbus; that it took place two hundred years later than the time we alleged; that Julius Cæsar lived only four hundred years ago; that Napoleon and Washington are fabulous characters, and, in fact, should assert that nearly all our dates and statements are fabrications made by our priests, what would we think of his impudence and ignorance? We could only retort upon him that the same must be the case with his own statements concerning his own country; and that as human nature is the same the world over, his priests had no doubt fabricated and falsified too.

What must intelligent Hindoos and Chinamen think of the impudence of such men as the opponent of Mrs. Besant in the discussion published in THE TRUTH SEEKER? Yet they are driven to a desperate extremity when they allege that Christna lived after Christ, or that the works giving his doctrins are of comparativly modern date. Why do they not allege that the divine Plato lived after Christ? Simply because there is too much knowledge among the readers of Grecian history. To any one who is familiar with Hindoo literature, the assertion made as to the age of Christna is as absurd as would be the allegation that Plato and Ben Franklin were contemporaries. We know that ages before Christ there was a splendid civilization in India, characterized by a learning and philosophy never surpassed by any age except the present, just as well as we know there was once a like civilization, learning, and philosophy in Greece, and we know they hav declined both in India and Greece.

Centuries before Christ, Alexander's invasion of India disclosed to the Greeks that a dense population occupied that region, living in a high condition of civilization and with a religion much the same as it is to-day. The priests were called Brahmans. We know that the earliest philosophers of Greece went to the East for light and information several centuries before Alexander's day. We know that temples are still existing in India of marvelous workmanship, built so long ago that even in that land of ancient traditions their antiquity transcends all tradition, and that images of Christna and many of the scenes described by the Mahabarata are carved in the original work. That grand epic poem of India was to Hindostan what the Iliad was to Greece and Rome; what "Paradise Lost" is to Christendom; what the Old Testament is to Jewry. We know that Buddhism invaded India a few centuries prior to Mohammedanism.

The attempt to bring the age of Christna after Christ is like trying to crowd the invasion of Atilla, the Crusades, the American and French Revolutions, and Reformation all into one century. He who knows history knows it is an absurdity. Such tremendous events are prepared by the ages, and mankind moved more slowly in the past. Finally, there is not a scholar anywhere but will blush at such impudent assumptions.

What is the object of this falsification of history? It is done to get rid of the terrible proof that all the best doctrins of the New Testament are borrowed from Christna or the authors of the Mahabarata. But surely these bold falsifiers forget that we hav Plato. Ah! Perhaps they will claim that the author of Plato's works lived several centuries after Christ. Let any one who has the least doubt as to the equality of Plato with Christ read his "Dialogs." Let any one who doubts as to the superiority of Christna read a good translation (not a long-winded, verbose one) of the Bhagavad-Gita, which is a kind of interlude in the Mahabarata. I quote a few sentences from it to show those who hav not access to the work its superiority. Whoever is familiar with the Bible will recognize many expressions:

"Said the mighty one:

"Never did I or thou or any of mankind not exist, nor shall we ever cease to exist.

"As the soul in this body undergoes the changes of childhood, prime, and age, so does it obtain a new body. But no sensible man is troubled about that.

"The soul, unborn, changeless, eternal both as to future and past.

"As a man abandons worn-out clothes and takes other new ones, so doth the soul quit worn-out bodies and enter new.

"All things are invisible in their primal, visible in their intermediate, and again invisible in their final state.

"To the noble mind infamy is worse than death.

"Let thy motiv for action be the action itself, never its reward.

"He who reflects not has not calm. Can he who is uncalm be happy? As doth the winds toss the ship on the waves, so do roaming thoughts the soul of man, and bear away his knowledge of the spirit.

"I am reproduced in every age to establish duty. Understand that even as the mighty air wanders everywhere, always dwelling within the ether, so all existing things exist in me. The deluded despise me in my human form, not understanding my high existence.

"But those who worship me with devotion dwell in me and I also in them.

"He who worships me shall never perish.

"Worship me by overcoming this fiuite and wretched world, placing thy heart upon me, sacrificing to me and saluting me. Thus shalt thou come to me.

"I am the origin of all. From me all proceeds. Believing me to be thus, the wise, gifted with meditativ power, worship me. Thinking on me, dead in me, teaching one another and constantly telling of me, they are both satisfied and delighted.

"'Bear with me, O God, as a father with his son, as a friend with a friend, as a lover with the beloved one,' said Arjuna.

"Dispose thy heart toward me only; to me attach thy thoughts, and thou shalt dwell with me on high after this life. But if thou art not able, strive, then, to reach me by assiduous devotion, O despiser of wealth. But if thou art not even able to do that, do good for my sake. Thou shalt attain beatitude even by good acts for my sake.

"The man who is the same to friend or foe, in honor or dishonor, the same in pleasure or pain, free from self-interests, taciturn alike in praise or blame, content with all, who has no home, is steadfast in mind and devout, is dear to me."

The foregoing are a few texts selected almost at random out of several chapters. Reading them one will not be surprised at the extreme jealousy of our Christians respecting the antiquity of the work. The following is a kind of litany from the same:

"O God of all the gods, Lord of all beings, of Brahma on his throne, and all the demi-gods, and cherubim and seraphim!

"Thou art of infinit forms, and hast neither beginning, middle, nor ending, O Lord of all—of the form of all!

"O thou mass of light, beaming everywhere, intolerable to look upon, as the sun, immeasurable!

"Thou art the indivisible, the highest object, the supreme receptacle of all the universe, the everlasting person!

"Thou art without end, middle, or beginning, of infiuit strength, with sun and moon as eyes, mouths like a kindled fire, heating all the universe with thy splendor!

"The triple world is astounded at thy miraculous and terrific form, O mighty one!

"To thee turn the affrighted Suras!

"The multitudes of Maharshis and Siddhas praise thee, crying, 'Hail to thee!'

"All the Rudras, Varsus, and Maruts behold thee and are amazed!

"Be merciful, O Lord of Gods, habitation of the universe!

"As torrents of rivers flow down into ocean, even so do all the heroes of the human race flow into thy flaming mouths! Devouring all inhabitants of the world from every quarter, thou lickest thy flaming lips!

"Filling the universe with thy splendors, thy sharp beams burn, O Vishnu!

"Tell me who thou art of awful form! Be merciful!

"Hail to thee, O best of gods!"

Who may not see in the foregoing whence some of the celebrated psalms of David were drawn? Now the only question is this: whether the priests of an ancient religion borrowed their scriptures from another people far distant from them, like the Jews? We might put it this way: whether it is more probable that the Roman Catholics would borrow of the Mormons or the Mormons of the Roman Catholics?

There can be no question as to which is the elder as between Brahmanism and Jewry. Not one of all the great scholars has ever raised a doubt. Therefore Christianity is an offshoot of Buddhism and Brahmanism.

What Kind of a Plan is This?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I think that to gain success for our cause the first step would be to organize Liberal League clubs in every school district in the country and every ward in cities and towns, these clubs to be kept alive and made interesting by speaking, debating, and calling in our Christian brethren and having joint discussions.

Let each county hav a central committee composed of one delegate from each townshhip and ward. Let the chairmen of county committees constitute the district committee, and chairmen of the district committee compose the state central committee, and chairmen of state central committee compose the national committee.

To accomplish this, let every true Liberal go to work and organize these clubs, and unite them by sending the names of the president and secretary to D. M. Bennett; let him keep a record of the same, and send a printed charter to said club, which shall send in one dollar with the names of the president and secretary to pay for the charter and to help the cause along. Mr. Bennett will be acting as chairman of the organizing committee, so to speak, thereby doing good work for the cause.

Let said clubs send every month and get documents, speeches, etc., to circulate, and spread the light of truth.

Let the Liberal papers of the country make monthly statements of the number of clubs and where they are located; also the names of officers, so that the clubs can correspond with one another. This should be the duty of this paper, and it should be paid for the trouble and expense.

The time has come when we must up and put our shoulders to the wheel. We hav work to do, and I, for one, say let it be done. It is the cause of freedom. It is the taking away of the veil from those beautiful stars, and the putting forth of the white rose of nature from the bud into a sublime greatness, the taking away of the sword from the hand of the church, and giving therefor the right to be happy without misery.

A. M. CLARK.

"The Old Faith and the New."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been letting this truly interesting volume, by David Friedrich Strauss, lie unread for weeks, simply because I expected to find it dry and uninteresting to a real Materialist who has been over and over the same ground. But lo! On opening it and glancing over its pages I find it full of meat—full of food for the most advanced thinker. True, the very name of the renowned author should hav prepared one for this; but having long ago read his "Life of Jesus," I had insensibly kept him standing on the same old ground, whereas he has really gone right on, on, on to Atheistic Materialism, and will inevitably take every careful, unprejudiced reader of this book straight to the same desirable goal.

In analyzing the gospels he thus sums up the conclusions: "'These things came to pass that it might be fulfilled as it is written,' is the invariable comment of our honest Matthew whenever he has been relating something that never came to pass at all."

In answering his first pertinent question, "Are we still Christians?" he says, "If we would speak as honest, upright men, we must acknowledge we are no longer Christians."

In speaking of the study of the sciences, poets, and arts, he remarks: "It is said that such a reading and study does not suit the plain man; that he lacks the needful leisure and comprehension. Our poets especially, it is said, are too much above him. The Bible is more suitable for him; this he can understand. He understands the Bible, does he? But how many of the theologians understand it—pretend to understand it? Yes, men think they understand the Bible because they hav grown accustomed to misunderstanding it."

The whole book goes to show that faith in the Bible and belief in a real God hav gradually gone with all other myths into mere shadows of a shade. But many still cling to the shades because they feel a need of something on which to lean. "The loss of the belief in providence belongs, indeed, to the most sensible deprivations which are connected with a renunciation of Christianity. In the enormous machine of the universe, amid the incessant whirl and hiss of its jagged iron wheels, amid the deafening crash of its ponderous stamps and hammers, in the midst of this whole terrific commotion, man, a helpless and defenseless creature, finds himself placed, not secure for a moment that on an imprudent motion a wheel may not seize and rend him, or a hammer crush him to powder. This sense of abandonment is at first something awful. But then what avails it to hav recourse to an illusion? Our wish is impotent to refashion the world. The understanding clearly shows that it is indeed a machine. But it is not merely this. We do not only find the revolution of pitiless wheels in our world-machine, but also the shedding of soothing oil. . . . Although chance may be an unreasonable ruler, yet necessity, or the enchainment of causes in the world, is reason herself. . . . To demand an exception in the accomplishment of a single natural law would be to demand the destruction of the universe."

I think few will read this book and rise from its perusal unsatisfied. I am indeed glad to hav it among the list of TRUTH SEEKER publications, and trust that its real merits will win for it a ready sale among all classes of readers. It is well worth its price. Respectfully,

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

These are some of his moral maxims:

A man who foolishly does me wrong I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love; the more evil that goes from him the more good shall go from me.

Let a man overcome anger with love; let him overcome evil by good; let him overcome the greedy by liberality; the liar by truth.

Hatred ceases by love; this is the eternal rule.

Who casts aside his appetites, who keeps armed with the virtues, well endowed with temperance and integrity, he indeed is worthy of the yellow garment.

As the rain breaks through the ill-thatched roof, so passion invades the mind destitute of reflection.

The evil-doer mourns in this world, and he shall mourn in the next; in both worlds has he sorrow. He grieves, he is tormented, seeing the ill of his deeds.

A man slothful, saying many good things but not doing them, is like a herdsman counting the kine of others but owning none.

As the bee collects nectar and departs without injuring the beauty or the odor of the flower, so the sage sojourns among men; he views their ways and learns wisdom from their folly.

If one man conquers in battle a thousand times a thousand men, and if another conquers himself he is certainly the greater victor.

If a man offend a harmless, pure, and innocent person, the evil falls back upon the fool like dust thrown against the wind.

Let a man so make himself as he teaches others to be; he who is well subdued may subdue others; one's own self is difficult to subdue.

He who holds back rising anger like a rolling chariot, him I call a real driver; the rest do but hold the reins.

By goodness overcome anger; by good, evil; by liberality, greed; by openness and truth, dissembling and falsehood.

There is no fire like lust, no bondage like hatred, no toil like perturbation, no river like desire.

Let us live happily, then, not hating those who hate us; let us dwell free from hatred among men who hate.

Let us live happily, free from greed among the greedy. Let us live happily, though we call nothing our own. We shall be like the bright gods, feeding on happiness.

He who has given up both victory and defeat, he, the contented, is happy.

My law is a law of mercy for all. Proclaim it freely to all men; it shall cleanse good and evil, rich and poor, alike; it is as large as the spaces of heaven, and excludes none.

Forsake all evil, bring forth good; master thy own thoughts. Such is Buddha's path to the end of all pain.

Overcome evil with good, the avaricious with generosity, the false with truth.

One day of endeavor is better than a hundred years of sloth.

Watch thyself with all diligence, and hold thyself in as the spirited steed is held in by its owner.

Master thyself; so mayest thou teach others and easily tame them, after having tamed thyself; for self is hardest to tame.

Think not lightly of evil; drop by drop the jar is filled. Think not lightly of good; the wise are filled with purity, gathering it drop by drop.

The good, like snowy mountains, shine from afar; the bad, like arrows shot by night, are not seen.

The taint worse than all others is ignorance.

The heart of love and faith accompanying good actions spreads a beneficent shade through all the world.

I must defer quotations from other ancient moral teachers till my next. Truly yours, D. M. B.

Letters from Friends.

OGDEN, UTAH, May 22, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed find $5, as promised in support of the proposed trip round the world. I did not see my name on the list of promisers published with the call for the money. But as I did promis, here it is with my full will power thrown in, and my desire that the angels may protect you from all harm and assist you to return safe and sound to your loved home and your unfinished mission in the publishing of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours, JOHN A. JOST.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5 for your trip around the world. I want the book as soon as possible. The blood of a thousand saviors and the blood of the cattle of ten thousand hills cannot wash out from the church door the stain caused by your imprisonment. They tried to kill you, but failed. Giv them "hades." Respectfully, H. T. S.

LEADVILLE, COL., May 26, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $10 to be applied to the round-the-world fund—$5 for myself and $5 for E. W. Orgen. Now, old friend, you may rest assured you are taking my best wishes with you all round the globe and a hope of your return safe and sound to your paper, and may it liv long after we are no more. Your friend, JOSEPH HENRY.

NAPLES, N. Y., May 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I inclose money order for $5 for my subscription to your trip around the world. I expected to hav sent the money last week, but I had an accident in which I was violently thrown from a wagon, breaking my collarbone and otherwise injuring me. I am quite comfortable at present, and expect soon to be about my business.

They hav been building a very fine Methodist church here this season. A well-disposed member wanted me to go with them and help along. I told him if they would allow freedom of speech I would giv them $500, but I could not feel at home if I was denied the right that was guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. They hav not yet called for the money.

My best wishes go with you on your trip, and we need hav no fears as to the paper during your absence. We know how Mr. Macdonald stood at the helm in the worst storm, and we will trust him in the calm. Yours for the right, J. W. PRICE.

FOX LAKE, May 28, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: The theological world certainly moves, and I think it may be safe now for you to attempt to circumnavigate it. I notice in the late revision of the New Testament that hell is knocked out of it. There is no longer any call for a Lucifer or devil to stir up the brimstone. You hav killed off all the man-made gods, and I think you can hav nothing to fear. Within find $5 to help you around the world. Yours, C. B. HOWES.

MUSKEGON, MICH., May 23, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for $5 as a means of exposing to public gaze the deformity and superstition of the past and lighting the way to the future to do right because it is right.

W. JONES.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., May 17, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find post-office order for $5. I sincerely hope that the long trip you are about to undertake will prove as beneficial to you financially and physically as no doubt it will be interesting to your readers. Yours, RALPH HELM.

MENDON, May 19, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5 to speed you on your way round the world as previously agreed upon. Thomas Paine made himself immortal by his writings, and if you get through this trip all right, this book and your previous works will immortalize you unless another dark age of Christianity should pass over the earth and annihilate you both, as it has many a great man before you. You hav my wishes for a successful trip. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

JAMESPORT, MO., May 21, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I see by your issue of the 7th inst that you hav received encouragement enough to make you conclude to start on the voyage soon. Therefore I inclose money order for the amount I promised, $5. Although I do not see my name in the list published in the issue of the above date, I trust you will not overlook it now. With the best wishes for your health and happiness, I am,

Yours fraternally, W. D. SHULER.

BONANZA, COL., May 24, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to apply to your trip around the world. Will try and send you five more before you start. Very truly yours, F. H. MOORE.

CARROLTON, ILL., May 31, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Pardon me for my late remittance. I hav been from home for four weeks and was ignorant of your determination to take the round-the-world trip. I hope I am yet on time and also hope that every promis will be fulfilled. I see that one friend in St. Louis withdrew his promis and said he would giv you $5 to stay at home. Well, now I consider he is clearly entitled to send the "V" in either case. If others receive the books in consideration of the $5 I suppose I would be entitled to them, but really I fear you cannot afford it; in that case I do not hold you accountable. My best wishes go with you, and may a pleasant and enjoyable trip be your reward. I want you to bring me a small piece of Lot's wife just to test the truth about the salt. Good-bye; take care of yourself, WM. BLACK.

BRAIDWOOD, ILL., May 22, 1881.

MR. EDITOR; Please find postal order for $5 to help you on your long journey and for the Infidel around the world. A tape-line and a pocket-compass are the two handiest things I know of to a traveler in Asia. The Freemasons hav very many traditions about that rocky corner of the earth, a few I will mention in form of question. Is the coast near Joppa rock-bound and dangerous? What is the distance from Joppa to Mount Lebanon by sea? What kind of cedars grow on Mount Lebanon? Is there any road by which heavy timbers were taken from Joppa to Jerusalem? Are there holes or clefts in the rocks west of Jerusalem, where men can hide and not be found? Is there any white marble quarries in that country or any white marble in or around Jerusalem that might hav been used in the temple? Some two or three days journey south from Jerusalem are the ruins of a large city cut in the rocks; I would like for you to visit and describe them. That car of Juggernaut, see if you can find it, or has it gone with Marco Polo's upas-tree and men with dogs' heads? The temple at Jerusalem was an immense slaughter-house; where did the filth all go to? When you come home come by St. Louis and Chicago and stop off at Braidwood. I wish to shake hands with you. Respectfully, FERRIS BURR.

CARBONDALE, KAN., May 19, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: As I was one of the first to pledge you a "V" for the trip around the world I want to be one of the first to respond when called on. Inclosed is $5.00. Now I hav but a few requests to make and these are, when you get to the Holy Land if you see an ass by the wayside let him stay there, do not ride him without the consent of his owner; do not tell your followers that it is right to pluck corn from your neighbors without permission; tell them we are coming to bring peace, not a sword. I am as ever,

Fraternally thine for truth, WM. BROWN.

LARAMIE CITY, May 19, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed is $5 for your round-the-world trip. I expect to get value received from your trip abroad. I am one that wants you to make the trip; would like to hav you lecture on your way home from San Francisco to New York; it will pay you, especially through the West. There are a good many Liberals in Laramie. I am a mechanic and hav had a good deal of business with the church.

A few years ago, when times were very hard, when an honest mechanic could scarcely earn an honest living, I landed in Colorado from California in a small town. In order to get aquainted with the people I told them I would donate twenty dollars in work to every denomination that would build a church; that I would do their work by the day for journeyman's wages, or if they would furnish the material I would do their work as cheap as the cheapest man and giv twenty dollars to the church, but they knew my circumstances, they knew my poverty would compel me to work for anything I could get. I told them I could not furnish material and compete with a dishonest world as the lowest bidder; that the lowest bidder meant the worst possible work for the least money; it meant the worst possible work with the least material; it meant the biggest rascal, but it was no use; to get their work I was compelled to put myself on equality with the biggest rascal—the lowest bidder; my poverty compelled me to take their work for anything I could get; because I was honest that cursed church left me in debt; it gave me the name of a dead beat, because I did too honest work on the house of God to pay my honest debts, but they are paid now; but I honestly believe it is better to be a cattle thief or a bank robber, and steal from the rich, than it is to take advantage of a man's poverty to rob him of his labor. I believe if a church was the house of God an honest mechanic could get honest pay for honest labor on his building. I believe I could get better pay for my labor on a gambling house than I could on a church. If any accident should happen to me so I was unable to work and needed charity I believe I could find more generosity, I believe I could find more charity, in a gambling hell than I could find in God's holy temple, the church. I believe I could find more little, mean, confidence men in a church than I could find in a gambling house. WM. LOSHBOUGH.

WATERLOO, IND., May 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal order for $5, it being the amount subscribed to assist in defraying the expense of circumnavigating this speck of matter in nature's vast laboratory. Hope you will hav a pleasant time, for we will often think of you and the contrast while you were sojourning at Albany simply to gratify sister Hayes and brother Comstock.

Yours respectfully, E. R. SHOEMAKER.

ST. JOHN'S, ILL., May 23, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I received your request for the five dollars I promised, and I send it with best wishes for your success, hoping you will accomplish the trip in safety, for we cannot afford to lose you.

Your friend and well-wisher, JOHN BULMER.

GENEVA, N. Y., May 21, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $5 for the world trip. You must hav the people send in the funds before you go, or they might not be forthcoming. You ought to hav twenty-five hundred of these pledges before starting. I will see if I can get a few more in this town the coming week.

Yours truly, WILLIAM SMITH.

CASTLE HILL, MAINE, May 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I herein send you $5 for the world trip. If your coming letters will compare with those in the "Infidel Abroad," I shall be well paid for the investment. The Bennett-Mair discussion is interesting, and when you get it out in book form put me down for one. I believe you are the right man in the right place. Col. Ingersoll and you are shaking Christian theology to its foundation. I would giv $5 to hear Col. Ingersoll lecture.

Yours respectfully, HENRY TILLEY.

DES MOINES, IOWA, May 21, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I am glad that the prospect for your going round the world is cheering, notwithstanding a few of your friends entertain rather gloomy notions of the undertaking. My notion is that the trip, with its varied scenes and exercises, together with a freedom of feeling to be free of the care of watching your enemies for a season, will assist in recuperating your physical being; and then when you come to the places where the gods themselvs are supposed to hav lived, and tread the same rocks and sands that they walked upon long ago, no doubt your thoughts will hav a mythical time; and when you come to places where lie the ashes of noted poets, philosophers, orators, and statesmen, your mind will receive, as it were, a new baptism in the fountains of knowledge. When you return home with the varied scenes witnessed mirrored on your mind, with uncouth experiences with strange people, etc., you will be better enabled to make a tour of the United States (which some propose instead of making a circuit of the globe) and giv us an interesting account of the new experiences gathered while gone. I am of the opinion that on your return home there will be a general demand by Freethinkers that you make a lecturing trip through the United States. Hoping that all who hav pledged assistance to the enterprise will be prompt in remitting the same so as not to embarrass you in preparing for the trip, I remain, Yours truly,

A. CLEGG.

KIMBALL, May 30, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I see from the tab on my paper that I hav become your debtor. But still the valuable TRUTH SEEKER continues to come, for which I must extend to you my thanks. I am always proud to receive it; and among the number of papers that I receive weekly, it is the first one I peruse. Inclosed please find the sum of $8—$3 to pay for the paper, and the remainder to be placed to my credit to help defray the expenses of our noble hero, D. M. Bennett, round this little globe. For my part, I would like to hav you stop at home and occasionally throw a few Infidel shells into the ranks of the orthodox. But looking at the matter in another light, I say: "Go. By all means go." Your book will be a benefit to the Liberal cause, and one which no historian can surpass; and the time will come when it will be referred to as the greatest historical work ever written. My sincere wishes are that you will return home from your voyage in good health and willing to defend the cause of liberty and truth as heretofore. Respectfully, S. E. MOSS.

ASHLAND, OR., May 26, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see you hav decided to journey around the world, so I send money order for the amount I and Joshua Beaumont pledged—$10. I wish we could send ten times as much. Take the best of care of yourself. Don't subject yourself to too much hardship. Take it easy. Our best wishes go with you.

Yours, O. COOLIDGE.

OTTAWA, ILL, May 30, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I had a neighbor almost persuaded to be an Infidel, and last Saturday at the eleventh hour I converted him. He gave me $5 for you and said he would take the book of your travels. I think he will be a subscriber before long. You will find money order for $10—$5 for J. A. Townsend and $5 for myself.

Yours truly, SILVESTER BROWN.

AUGUSTA, ME., May 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find money order for the amount of my subscription for your trip round this world of ours. See all you can and tell us all about it. I feel as though it would be money well spent, for you hav such good descriptiv powers and will giv us the truth, which I fear we never hav had. History has been written in the interest of superstition and bigotry. If you fail to go I will write you what Liberal books I want for my subscription. I hope you will enjoy good health while you are gone and return to us with renewed vigor to battle with bigotry. Yours for justice and truth,

C. M. PIPER.

MILLSBOROUGH, May 23, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find post-office money order for $10, being the amount which we promised to giv to the fund to your proposed tour round our world; $5 for John Mullinger, a resident of Millsborough and an admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its noble editor, and $5 from the undersigned.

Yours truly, JOSEPH MANHART.

BASCO, ILL., May 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I send you to-day in this registered letter my promised $5 for your trip round the world, and if it is not sufficient to pay for the contemplated book we will add more to it and make it right. My best wishes for your safe return and certainly a pleasant journey. Hoping THE TRUTH SEEKER will prosper in your absence, I remain your friend,

JOHN DIDIER.

NORTH BENTON, O., May 23, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Within find $5, to help pay your expenses round the world. If you lack money call on me for $5 more. We need something of the kind to help giv tone to the Liberal cause. The Christians claim everything that goes to advance knowledge and popularity. If slavery is popular they claim that. If freedom is popular they claim that. If polygamy is popular they claim that. If anti-polygamy is popular they claim that. The zeal they manifest to build up and perpetuate Christianity is evidence to me that their cause is unsound, for the truth is mighty and will prevail, and needs no bolstering up by false and undue zeal and torture as was practiced a few years ago and is practiced now in a different form. Yours, CHESTER BEDELL.

MAUSTON, WIS., May 19, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: Inclosed I send you money order for $10—George Salter $5 and your humble servant $5, to help you around the world—and I wish you may not meet with anything to mar your health or pleasure, and I will promis that I will not neglect to pay for my TRUTH SEEKER while you are gone. For one, I hav all confidence in your wife and Mr. Macdonald. The paper will lose nothing while you are gone if everyone will do their duty. I long to be reading your letters from abroad, which will be far more interesting to me than anything Mr. Mair has advanced yet. Your part of the discussion is always good reading, but that of Mr. Mair is as dry as his God and the Bible he quotes from.

Yours all around the world and back again all alive and kicking, WM. HOLGATE.

NEVADA, OHIO, May 27, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find $5, my share of the round-the-world fund. In your travels you will find all classes of people, good, bad, and indifferent. Should you find any dirtier, meaner scoundrel than Anthony Comstock, hav his picture taken, and on your return place both in the rogues' gallery. The scar-faced prince of American villians probably has his equal in degradation, and you may happen to see the brute. If possible bring a photograph of a flaming sword with you. It would be worth looking at. You will be likely to find them in the Garden of Eden, also a switch, such as an old Bible unworthy used in compelling iron axes to come to the surface of the water. It is said that the Christians of Rome still hav a demijohn filled with that remarkable darkness which once upon a time, according to the worst book in print, took place in the land of Egypt. For the fun of it get a dram vial full of it, It would be a wonderful curiosity.

Instead of sending me $225.00 worth of books, as stated in my last, make the order $450.00 worth, a duplicate of the other in every respect. The more I travel over the country the more intensely necessary do I find the scattering of your and similar publications among the people. I remember the attempt made while you were in prison to ruin THE TRUTH SEEKER and its publishing house, and hav fears such will again be the case in your absence. I, for one, am determined to counteract the effects of such a damnable scheme by doing my utmost in securing you subscribers and selling all I possibly can of your books whilst you are on your lonesome trip. I feel confident that I hav been of considerable account to your house in that direction already. I most sincerely hope that many Liberals will join me in this most important work. How many are willing to show their contempt for 75,000 pulpit roosters and their miserable business in this way? Let us show the millions that there two sides to this most important question. Millions will read our books if we giv them a chance to get them. They will not order them, but will buy them if we take them to them.

The rights of Mrs. Chase hav been most significantly interfered with. Let us prove to the postmaster-general that such imposition will not win, that the the day of persecution for opinion's sake is past. Yes, Mr. Postmaster-general, you stand high in office and can for the time being, if you are mean enough to, wrong a woman with rights as sacred as any person in the land, and this you hav done by being urged to do it by the meanest miscreant that ever walked the streets of New York. With George Chainey in the Infidel pulpit in Boston, Col. Ingersoll speaking to untold thousands in the largest as well as small cities in our land, and an army of Infidel lecturers besides—stars not shining as bright as the two above named, but equally important—together with some ten or fifteen outspoken Infidel papers and the prospect of adding hundreds to the list who are determined to canvass the country with Infidel books, together with the respect with which the editors of some of our leading papers besides our own are treating Liberalism, all signifies that in less than ten years Infidels will be very likely hav something to do with making the postmaster-general appointments.

Your friend and brother, DR. E. MOYER.

STILL THE OLD HAT.

CLEVELAND, O., May 19, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: When you were released from Albany penitentiary some year ago we felt a heart to be one of the number who offered to contribute $10 on that occasion as a feeble, very slight expression of sympathy, good will, etc. To do so it was necessary for daughter and I to wear our last year's hats, which we did with feelings of pleasure, a principle being subserved. The other day we decided to treat ourselvs to a more modern one. Just then came THE TRUTH SEEKER, with the announcement that four Freethought and medical journals had been suppressed! That so great an outrage and injustice be not endured, all worthy the name of Liberalist, Infidel, should consider it a personal affront demanding resentment. Those who serve as helmsmen must be sustained at whatever sacrifice! Lovers of liberty, of justice, of truth, shall our standard-bearers be cut down, our banner trailed in the dust, and we remain inactiv? To their rescue with the needful sinews of war! If necessary, forego accustomed enjoyments, and even necessaries; substitute simpler diet; wear the hat, gloves, gown another year; repel the idea of surrender; yield not to the intolerant, bloody sway of orthodoxy! Allow not the judiciary control to pass into evangelical hands! A fearful movement is being urged before the committee at Albany. The postal enactment of 1873 was foisted upon the people unknowing its secret intent. Various state laws of like nature hav succeeded. Strengthened and emboldened by these successes, greater latitude is now clamored for before the Albany legislativ committee. Mr. T. B. Wakeman nobly opposed the measure sought. It is easier to ward off and defeat such measures in incipiency than when full fledged.

We herewith inclose money order for our widow's mite to aid THE TRUTH SEEKER, upon which we rely as the heralder of truth, and the enemy's movements and attacks. This must be sustained. The flagrant wrongs to the editors in the late suppression is a personal affront to every human being. Justice is assailed! Liberty is in chains! Freedom is prostrated, bleeding at our feet! Let us to the rescue in an invincible, united brotherhood. Their cause is ours. Let us not deceive ourselvs. Orthodoxy is strengthening its fortifications at every point. Insidiously they are springing enactments whose treachery the people see not on their surface. They are powerful, wealthy, and daily adding to the same by extractions made from the church and unbelievers alike. Let us "pool" our efforts and means to resist every onslaught on freedom's rights.

Now that Mr. Bennett has decided to circumnavigate, we gracefully yield our preference, and pledge our best endeavors to extend THE TRUTH SEEKER and sustain the principles it advocates. Of course I shall wish the book of travels. I regret he feels a larger duty calls him to foreign lands. Our vision is too narrow to see in the same light, but we will ever try to accept with equanimity the inevitable.

May blessings attend him, a larger wisdom repay the toils of so arduous and hazardous a journey.

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

LYNNFIELD, MASS., May 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed $1 due for the paper the 15th of this month. As many subscribers are expressing their opinions regarding your trip round this terrestrial globe, I will take the liberty to express mine. I think your absence will incite your Liberal friends to contribute their talents, and if necessary to chip in to oil the machinery to run THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav only one fear if you go, that is, the Jesus eaters may try to suppress your paper when you are away. I consider the noble TRUTH SEEKER the standard Liberal paper of America, and hav no doubt with your devoted wife in the sanctum and friend Macdonald as editor, it will continue to be so in your absence.

Sometimes I pray to God, and sometimes to the devil—
You may think me very quaint, but still my head is level.
My God is not the Bible God that Christians love and fear,
My devil not the one he keeps to whisper in their ear;
My God is woman good and true that loves no priestly clan,
My devil is the monitor that makes me what I am.

Yours truly, JOS. A. PERLEY.

JANESVILLE, WIS., May 22, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: The "V's" are flowing in to you very liberally to pay your expenses round the world. You say but little about the "threes" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week, and as I am a delinquent for the last three weeks, I concluded to-day to "fork over the brass." To-morrow will be my seventy-ninth year on this little globe. I hate terribly to be in arrears in a good cause, so here is inclosed $3 to keep me posted for another year. Perhaps it is the last TRUTH SEEKER I shall ever need. Success to you while on your tour around the world. WARD WITHAM.

RANDOLPH, N. Y., May 22, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: The little tab on my paper reminds me that I am indebted to you for THE TRUTH SEEKER since April, 1881. I inclose draft for eight dollars—$3 to pay my subscription for another year, and $5 to help you circumnavigate the globe and get the books telling of the sights you will see. I hav not heretofore pledged myself to the fund, but hav all the time intended to contribute to it if I could possibly do so when the time came for you to start; I see you are soon to start, so I send it with my subscription. I think it will be a dreary journey to make alone. I wish some wealthy Liberal would accompany you. It would be the greatest pleasure in the world for me to do so had I the shekels and could leave my family. I hope you may hav a safe and pleasant journey. Bon voyage. J. HAMMOND.

P. S.—I wish you could hav started on your journey on the first anniversary of your release from the Christian prison to which the bigot Benedict consigned you, and in which the ninny Hayes kept you.

J. H.

SEBEWA, MICH., May 8, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: I thank you for continuing to send your most valuable paper to me so long after the time for which it was paid. Do go round the world and write up a history from an Infidel standpoint that will giv to all future generations the facts of Christian hireling cussedness. Set my name down for $5 to help you on your journey. When the time comes for you to start, notify in your paper, and the money will be sent in time. GEORGE W. LUSK.

DAYTON, OR., April 28, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Although I hav been a constant reader of your most valuable paper, and hav read all your European letters and hav them preserved in the house, still I wish to hav the book, therefore I will to-day send for two of the "Infidel Abroad," and one of the "World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors."

Hoping you may succeed in raising the necessary means for the proposed trip round the world, I remain your well-wisher, J. B. RILEY.

Orphic Hymn.

BY ALHAZA.

How long hast thou been dreaming, great God Pan,
Or training atoms into grooves to fall,
Or leaving each to choose his devious way,
If wishes can be found in things so small?

Hadst thou a thought and map, as Plato said,
As earthly engineers would make the world?
And was there once a pleasant, springlike day,
When suns and systems all their flags unfurled?

If thou art older than the oldest stars,
Why wears thy face that smile of boyish glee?
Then are we wrecks, unformed and cripples all,
That lack the spine of thy infinity.

Nothing can move without the wrath of heat;
The smallest atom in its rage must burn.
Didst thou with love make all creation glow,
Till keenest frost some fiery art did learn?

Thy well-tuned reeds, no doubt, were ever sweet;
Music and all things else were always known.
Didst thou from some orchestra come away
To greet the stars on our creation morn?

Impressions are retained, however faint;
So the sweet tale of life was never lost.
On every atom's tender brow it beamed,
Though blown by hurricane or tempest-tost.

The highest natures soonest lose their rank,
And in some dark seclusion fade away,
And reach at last the low atomic state
That floats and revels in the light of day.

But the electric chain is gleaming near
Which yokes each atom and each circling star,
And to unite the limbs that fall apart,
What god is stooping from his throne afar?

Conditions act their part and mold our forms;
Environments are dragons ever near;
But life's divinity will find its path,
Where brains can plot or feeling drop a tear.

say, shouldst thou strike, God Pan, some atom lone,
Its ready palm would yield thee back the blow;
And gods are only part of nature's scheme,
While they neglect and trample all below.

Thou hast hind's feet, O ever-climbing Pan,
That tread each crag in nature's godlike way;
But thou hast left us by the mountain side,
Without a gleam to light our mournful day.

And thou canst sup upon delicious fare
In clime salubrious, far beneath the snow,
While we are parching in the burning sand
Beside no streamlet's cool and pleasant flow.

Thou canst not leave those holy, heavenly hights
To still the torrents fierce of fire and blood
That drown the wretched beings thou hast made;
So, Pan, it seems thou art more fiend than god.

Let There Be Light!

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

The truth, some people try to show,
Can still with revelation go.
That matter always was they yield,
But God formed all things from its field.
God's move upon the waters' face
Was the first move they think took place.
He after that created light,
So he could guide his movements right.
That matter and God were ne'er begot,
Force came from God, but matter not;
Once all was still, no life or motion,
And God did nothing, that's their notion.
First all phenomena he planned,
Then moved it by his mighty hand.
The universe his force evolved—
The problem thus, they say, is solved.

Now let us see if they are right;
With God, we say, "Let there be light!"
Those things let us investigate,
And see if it will come out straight.
When water's forced from nativ state,
What cause makes it disintegrate?
The force is heat; naught else suffice;
Without this power it would stay ice.
Heat was e'er God moved o'er the deep,
Before he woke from his damp sleep.
That heat is but a form of force,
True science must admit, of course.
With heat and force there must come light;
To grant this churchmen may not quite,
But must grant they were made and done
Three days before there was a sun;
Must grant that force was in the field
When solid ice was made to yield.
Thus nature's laws began to swing
Before by God was done a thing.
With matter, light and heat and force,
Then all there is must be, of course.
These kept at work, in reason's view,
Leave nothing for a God to do.

The Creation.

BY J. HACKER.

A God awoke in darkness,
Six thousand years ago,
And looked around on nothing
To see what he could do.

He'd never had beginning,
Not born like you and me,
But always had existed
From all eternity.

But what he had been doing
Through all these countless years?
No priest has ever told us,
It in no book appears.

Perhaps he had been sleeping,
With nothing for a bed;
With nothing for a pillow
On which to lay his head.

With nothings for companions,
Through all that dreary night;
And only boundless nothing
On which to feast his sight.

He took a pinch of nothing,
And made the glorious earth;
Another pinch of nothing,
And oceans had their birth.

A little lump of nothing
Produced the powerful sun;
And so he worked on nothing
Till sky and stars were done.

And when the world was finished,
Of dust he made a man,
By mixing it with nothing
On some mysterious plan,

Then took a rib from Adam,
With nothing for a knife,
And mixing it with nothing
He made a full-grown wife.

And now dooms us to Tophet,
Unless we do repent,
For Eve once stole an apple
When she had "nary cent."

I wonder, oh, I wonder,
How these old Bible tales
Can ever find believers
Where common sense prevails!

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 278 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable! You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING
IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.
Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.
Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.
Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.
Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.
Our depots are open free for inspection to all classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.
NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.
JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.
The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain streugth in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DET. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DET. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

NO. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. There upon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the WILSONIA GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF HARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

WHETHER the soul be air or fire I know not, nor am I ashamed, as some men are, in cases where I am ignorant, to own that I am so.—Cicero.

I COULD no more teach my children as I was taught, and say, "They will grow out of it in due time," than I could feed them with poison and hope that exercise and growing strength would expel the enemy.—Anon.

THE wisest men make mistakes, and they make them in interpreting and deciding religious truth as much as in interpreting and deciding any other truth. There is no infallible teacher, there is no infallible church, and there never can be. A thousand men, or a million men, agreeing to say the same thing do not make that thing true. A doctrin is not true because it has been repeated for a thousand years in thousands of churches.—C. H. Brigham.

THE language in which Jesus taught, if he taught at all, has not been presented to us. Who recorded his actual words, if any real record ever existed, is all matter of guess. Who translated the words of Jesus into Greek no one knows. In the compass of four small pamphlets, attributed to four persons of whom nothing whatever can be ascertained, we hav what are by the orthodox supposed to be the words in which Jesus actually taught.—Bradlaugh's What Did Jesus Teach?

BUT I gae mad at their grimaces,
Their sighin', cantin', grace-proud faces,
Their three-mile prayers and half-mile graces;
Their zaxin's conscience,
Where greed, revenge, and pride disgraces
War nor their nonsense.

God knows, I'm nae the thing I should be,
Nor even yet the thing I could be,
But twenty times I rather would be
An Atheist clean
Than under gospel colors hid be,
Just for a screen.

SCIENTIFIC men no longer apologize; they assert with an emphasis the theologian cannot surpass. They hav their dogma; they lay down their law; they speak with an authority that carries weight from the power of their achievements as well as from the splendor of their talent. Their audience is immense, intelligent, enthusiastic; it comprehends the strongest thinkers and the most earnest workers. Their literary performances are marvelous for copiousness and brilliancy; they compel attention and enforce the necessity, if not of accepting special results, at least of adjusting beliefs to a new method.—O. B. Frothingham.

IF every just man that now pines with want
Had but a moderate and beseeming share
Of that which lewdly-pampered luxury
Now heaps upon some few with vast excess,
Nature's full blessings would be well dispensed
In unsuperfluous even proportion,
And she no whit encumbered with her store,
And then the giver would be better thanked,
His praise due paid; for swinish gluttony
Ne'er looks to heaven amidst his gorgeous feast,
But with besotted base ingratitude
Crams and blasphemes his feeder.
—Milton's Comus.

ARE the miracle stories credible? Every ancient nation has had its miracle-workers, but modern science has relegated all miracle history to realms of fable, myth, or fraud. Can Christian miracles be made the exceptions? That five thousand persons should be fed with five loaves and two fishes, and that an apparent excess should remain beyond the original stock, is difficult to believe; but that shortly after this, Jesus having again to perform a similar miracle for four thousand persons, his own disciples should ignore his recent feat, and wonder from whence the food was to be derived, is certainly startlingly incredible. If this exhibition of incredulity were pardonable on the part of the twelve apostles, living witnesses of greater wonders, how much more pardonable the unbelief of the skeptic of to-day.—Bradlaugh's When Were Our Gospels Written?

WHAT seem intuitions are often really inferences and not unfrequently erroneous inferences; what seem the immediate dictates of pure reason, or the direct and unclouded perception of a special spiritual faculty, may be the conceits of fancy, or the products of habits and association, or the reflections of strong feeling. A man must prove to himself, and he must prove to others that what he takes to be an intuition is an intuition. Is that proof in this case likely to be easier or more conclusiv than the proof of the divine existence? The so-called immediate perception of God must be shown to be a perception and to be immediate; it must be vindicated and verified; and how this is to be done, especially if there be no other reasons for believing in God than itself, it is difficult to conceive. The opinion that man has an intuition or immediate perception of God is untenable; the opinion that he has an immediate feeling of God is absurd.—Prof. Flint.

THE old ecclesiastical props of privilege are gone. There is no use any longer in quoting or misquoting scripture to prove that God wills the mass of mankind to be always poor and always dependent on the rich. The very peasant has now broken that spell, and will no longer believe the rector if he tells him that the world belongs to the squire, and that justice is put off to the rent. Hodge has determined to find out for himself, by a practical experiment, what the will of God really is. No doubt this is an imperfect world, and is likely to remain so for our time at least; we must all work on in the hope that if we do our duty, it will be well in the sum of things, and that when the far-off goal of human effort is at last reached every faithful servant of humanity will hav his part in the result; if it were not so it would be better to be a brute, with no unfulfilled aspirations, than a man. But I repeat, the religion of privilege has lost its power to awe or to control; and if society wishes to rest on a safe foundation it must show that it is at least trying to be just.—Goldwin Smith's Lectures and Essays.

WANTED TO WARM UP.

"Say, stranger, kin I get a fight in yere?" he asked, looking cautiously around and wetting his hands in a premonitory sort of way.

"What kind of a fight would you like?" asked the barkeeper, eyeing him gloomily.

"Pistol, knife, fist, tooth, anything. I want to liv up to the prevailin' style. Suit yourself, pardner."

"Well," observed the host, picking up a base ball bat, "how'll this suit you? Like to try something in this line?"

"Havn't you got a sword, or cleaver, or a buzz-saw, or somethin' that yer can rely onto—a weepon that goes more into the gore business?"

"This will do me," replied the barkeeper, waltzing over the bar and slamming the pugnacious visitor against the wall. "Don't need anything better than this," and he banged him across a beer table. Got enough?"

"I ain't got started yit," said the stranger, as he lifted the barkeeper over the stove. "Don't get impatient. I'll warm up in a second," and he hoisted his antagonist over the bar. "Just indulge these yere false starts; I'll go under the string for a heat in a minute," and he hauled the barkeeper out by the ear and broke half a dozen chairs with him. "I'll rouse you pooty quick now. Gimme a little time," and he danced a hornpipe on his foe and then pitched him through the back door. "Now I'm feelin' the inspiration! Whoop! Hi, stranger! Ain't this fruit? Talk about spring vegetables! What's lamb and peas to this?" and he fired the unhappy barkeeper down cellar.

"What was your object in wanting to fight me?" asked the wolloped barkeeper, as he crawled out and set the bottle and glasses on the counter.

"You, see, pardner," said the stranger, filling the glass to the brim, and holding it between his eyes and the light, "you see I've only been married a month, and I havn't been home for a week, and I wanted to be warmed up into trim for the matinee. MYRIADS of locusts infest various parts of the West and South.

A PESTIFEROUS Chicago alley is called Hell, and its denizens Hellions.

A WITNESS in an Ottawa court refused to be sworn on the old version of the Bible, and the judge allowed the use of a revised New Testament.

THE mayor of Cincinnati has not only closed the theaters, saloons, and concert gardens, but announces that Sunday picnics must not be given.

THE Rev. Edward Everett Hale says that the revision of the New Testament "will end forever the idolatry of a book which has been a dead weight on Protestantism for three centuries."

A NEW industry—the extensiv cultivation of flowers for perfumery purposes—is about to be started in California. In Europe it is very remunerativ. A good crop of lavender will yield $1,500.

IT is asserted that the tract of country, including the celebrated "Everglades," which the state of Florida is now going to drain, will be able to produce more sugar than the United States can consume.

KING KALAKAUA of the Sandwich Islands is making the tour of the world, and proposes to do the job in something under eighty days if possible. At last accounts he was in Asia, on his way home via Paris and New York.

AN allopathic physician at Mount Clemens, Michigan, refused to act as a pall-bearer at a funeral because a homœopath had also been invited. These doctors are nearly as bigoted as their brothers, the doctors of divinity.

THE death of a woman at Portsmouth, R.I., revealed the unsuspected fact that for sixteen years she had kept a maniac son concealed in an attic room, attending to his wants herself, and never letting another human being see him.

LORD SHAFTESBURY lately stated that $180,000,000 has been spent on church building in England in this century—and yet there are unbelievers. Why does not God draw all souls to him when the preliminaries hav been so adequate and expensiv?

PARSEES around the "Towers of Silence"—whither the corpses of Parsees at Bombay are taken immediately after death to be devoured by vultures—will often wait and watch until every atom of the flesh of those they love has been consumed by the birds.

DES MOINES has a praying band of women who hold service every Sunday in the jail. A member became infatuated with a handsome young horse thief, and planned to help him escape by disguising him in woman's clothing as one of the band; but she failed.

"IF a doctor has the luck to find out a new malady," said Oliver Wendell Holmes the other day, "it is tied to his name like a tin kettle to a dog's tail, and he goes clattering down the highway of fame to posterity with his attachment following at his heels."

IF all that is said of the Faure electric battery be true, then we hav well nigh come upon the millenium of light and heat. But is it true or is it another Edison boomerang which comes back to strike the original inventor? We must confess the authority for Faure is somewhat better than that which made Edison a great man.

IN the Life of Bishop Wilberforce, by his son, the bishop writes that an archbishop, who was entirely unmoved by the denunciations of an antagonist in a discussion on ecclesiastical affairs, turned "ashy pale" when he threatened to pray for him. "No," he cried, "don't do that, I pray you; that is unfair; anything but that."

A GOOD many people, believing that they hav only two or three days to liv, are preparing their ascension robes. Several planets are to collide on the 19th inst., and this little ball is to be roasted like an apple in the rush of worlds which is expected to follow the collision. Truth promises to hav a trustworthy reporter on the spot to write only what he sees.

JARED PRICE, of Reading, Pa., having arrived at a point in his religious experience where he was entirely free from worldliness, concluded that he would go to heaven immediately. To all arguments he replied that if heaven was a happier place than earth, and he was sure of an entrance, it was foolish to delay going. Therefore he killed himself.

DEACON CHARLES G. JOHNSON, of the Twelfth Street Reformed church, Brooklyn, issued a warrant for the arrest of James McElhinney, a fellow-church-member, on a charge of sending a letter to the deacon's wife, accusing him of immorality with a lady in Fifteenth street. The alleged scandalous letter was signed, "Yours in Christ, Mary, and John."

A BROOKLYN clergyman has presented his children's pet dog with a dinner service of green majolica. The dog comes to the table regularly whenever the bell is rung for meals, and is also a stated attendant on family prayers. The animal's behavior during time of worship is quite as decorously devout as that of the other members of the household.

THE Boston society which was started eight years ago for the encouragement of women in the pursuit of studies at home now has 960 pupils, scattered throughout the country, but all under the direction of 174 unpaid teachers, who put themselvs in correspondence with the pupils, and direct them what to read in order to acquire any desired knowledge. The originator and present director is Miss Anna E. Ticknor.

THE prevailing impression that the Druids were persons flourishing only in a bygone era is shown to be erroneous, from the fact that the United Ancient Order of Druids of the State of New York met in this city last week. Noble Grand Arch Wohn, Deputy Grand Arch Hoffman, Grand Guardian Blah, Grand Herald Reinhard, and several other officers, all grand, seem to indicate by their names that the ancient Druids were of Teutonic origin.

PASTOR HENRY E. DUER, of Shiloh Baptist church, William street, Newburgh, was arrested on the 10th on a charge of grand larceny. William Hawkins, one of the officers of the church, applied for the warrant to Recorder Waring. Hawkins alleges the stealing of the organ, pulpit, chairs, and other furniture of the church. There has been serious trouble in the congregation for some time. It will now be settled in the courts. Duer was admitted to bail.

THE portrait of Adam in the Sistine Chapel, painted by Michael Angelo, has faded until his left eye is almost invisible. But even in far worse plight is that of God, painted by Raphael, in the loggie. The painter boldly represented the creator of the universe as a naked old man, with long, flowing beard, and bald on the top of his head. Lapse of time has caused the beard to disappear, thus giving the whole figure the most comical and undignified aspect imaginable.

THERE are at present, in the Old World and the New World, more than a hundred thousand railway locomotivs. Their total force is equal to 30,000,000 horse power, and all the other steam-engins on the globe are estimated at 46,000,000 horse power. The technical "horse power," however, is really equal to three average horses, and each horse to about seven men. The aggregate power, therefore, of all the engins is vastly more than the effectiv force of all the human workers living. Four-fifths of the steam-engins now at work hav been made within a quarter of a century or so.

A RECENT number of Henri Rochefort's Intransigeant contains a report of a trial of the officials and monks of the "Convent of Good Works," from which it appears that the name of the institution is a hideous satire upon it. The trial reveals the lowest depths of moral turpitude. Brother Amadee goes to prison for three and a half years, and others are severely condemned. One brother excused his immorality on the ground that "it was punishment to the pupils."

DR. W. S. PLAYFAIR, writing to the British Medical Journal, says: "I should like to direct the attention of practitioners to the artificial human milk now prepared by the Aylesbury Dairy Company, at a cost little over that of the best nursery milk. This valuable method of treating cow's milk was first brought under my notice some years ago by Dr. Frankland, the eminent chemist, who devised it for one of his own children who was ill, and I hav since used it in my practice. Its composition is absolutely identical with that of human milk, and under its use the risks and disadvantages of the bottle-feeding of infants are reduced to a minimum."

THE whole question is still further complicated by the recent doubts that hav been introduced regarding the word of God. The New Testament revisers—learned and holy men—tell us that the last edition (their own) is the only reasonable and sensible one. The English Lord Chancellor tells us we must pay a penalty if we pay any attention to the revised Bible. Between the two we are in great doubt about our salvation. The revisers tell us we must inevitably be damned if we believe in the old version, and the Lord Chancellor insists we shall be damned if we don't, and both authorities are excellent in their way. What shall we do, O Lord! what shall we do?—Truth.

Two of the Chicago daily newspapers printed the revised New Testament complete. This gave a chance to revive an old story. A pugilistic bummer picked up a copy of one of these papers and his eyes happened to fall on an account of the crucifixion. He read the narrativ with astonishment and increasing indignation. At length he darted into the street, grabbed a Jew who was inoffensivly passing, and gave him a tremendous thrashing. "What did you do that for?" asked the policeman who rescued the victim. "Because he's a Jew," was the reply, "and crucified the Savior." "Why, that happened almost two thousand years ago," said the officer. The wrath of the fighter was partly blown out in a long whistle, and he remarked, "Well, I never heard of it till a few minutes ago."

A FEW days since Recorder Besher, of Bayonne, was presented with a Testament of the new version, and on Friday last had a case before him, in which a colored brother was called upon to testify. When the book was presented to him to swear upon, he drew back in a startled manner and asked, "Am dat de new wersion?" The judge replied that it was, and the latest improvement out, when Sambo straightened himself up and delivered himself thusly: "Jedge, I'se a Christian ob de ole school, an' b'long to de hard clam shell Baptist church, an' we don't take no stock in de new wersion. De ole book war written by de Lor hisself an' gibben to Moses, who war a black man. Dis yer new wersion war got up by Bob Ingersel an' his Infidels, an' am a trick ob de debbel, who hab turned de heads ob de white folks; but yer can't turn de wool ob dis niggah's head; taint no good nohow. Why, sah, didn't massa Abe Linkum swar out de proclamation o' mancipation on de ole book, an' Grant trabble frow de wilderness by the light of it? An' in dese latter days didn't General Garfield an' his mule git conwerted by it on the towpath? No, sah, yer might as well swar me on Dan Bryant's song book as on dat." The argument was convincing, and the judge laid the book on one side and swore him on the ancient book, to Sambo's great satisfaction.

News of the Week.

BULGARIA is in a state of siege.

THREE inches of rain fell in this city last week.

EARTHQUAKES were felt in Chio and Geneva on the 11th.

AN eclips of the moon occurred on the morning of the 12th.

TRICKETT, the Australian oarsman, arrived here on the 11th.

JOHN GRISCOM, the Chicago faster, after sixteen days, still holds out.

J. R. KEENE'S horse Foxhall won the Grand Prize of Paris last Sunday.

THE Ohio Republicans hav renominated Charles Foster for governor.

SEVERAL Russian army and navy officers hav been arrested for alleged Nihilism.

TWELVE hundred brewery workmen in this city are now on strike for shorter hours.

THE Whittaker trial is concluded, but the Judges hav not yet rendered their verdict.

THE elevator at the Excelsior stores, Brooklyn, was burned last Sunday. Loss, about $110,000.

THE prosecution of the Star Route swindlers drags along very slowly. No indictments hav yet been found.

BY the explosion of a boiler at Pottsville, Pa., on the 10th., twelve men were seriously injured, three being fatally scalded.

THE census bureau has spent its appropriation, and the work must now be done by volunteers, who will hav to trust to Congress to pay them.

THREE captains of ocean steamers hav been arrested by the authorities of this city, and held to bail, for carrying more steerage passengers then their license allows.

QUEBEC had a large conflagration on the 8th. Hundreds of houses were burned to the ground. Five persons were killed. The loss is estimated at about $2,000,000.

THE dory Little Weston started from England for this port on the 13th. The boat is less than twenty feet long, and is sailed by two men. She made the trip over in about two months.

THE disturbances in Ireland still continue. It is now claimed by the Fenian leaders that the loss of the English war sloop Doterel was occasioned by the explosivs placed in her by their men.

THE books of the Brooklyn Board of Education hav mysteriously disappeared. A commission is investigating the accounts, and a deficiency of $50,000 has been been found. Hence the disappearance.

THE town of Americus, in Kansas, was almost entirely destroyed by a tornado on the 10th. Two churches were literally blown to pieces. Several houses in Emporia, an adjoining town, were razed by the wind.

THE teachers in a Catholic Brothers' school in Hartford, Conn., hav been detected in inciting boys to steal uncanceled internal revenue stamps off beer barrels. The stamps were sent to France and sold for the benefit of a Catholic asylum.

AN attempt was made to blow up the town hall at Liverpool, Eng., but the only damage done was in the smashing of windows. Two men were arrested as the perpetrators. On their persons were found papers connecting them with the Fenian organization of this city.

THE deadlock in the election of senators still continues at Albany. Assemblyman Bradley, a Conkling man, says Senator Sessions, an Administration man, paid him $2,000 to vote for Depew. He deposited the money with the speaker of the House, and an investigation is in progress.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Seventeenth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You have called upon me for the proofs of the existence of God. In the beginning of our argument I had no suspicion that you doubted this. It seems to me so irrational for any sane intelligence to contemplate the harmony and unity of the universe, the evident proof of contrivance which appears in everything about us, from the wild flower turning upward to that great luminary toward which it lifts its cup, that I can scarcely believe that any man can place his hand upon his heart and say, "There is no God." Yet this seems to be the culmination of the wisdom and science of the present day, and contrary to the divine oracles which declare that it is the fool who hath said in his heart that there is no God, its verdict is that it is the fool who affirms that there is a God.

The answer to your demand seems like an elaborate proof of an axiom, and its difficulties are precisely as great as it would be to prove that the sun shines. And in the present brief synopsis which I shall make of one or two arguments, I cannot, of course, originate anything novel, but merely restate what has been often before presented far more perfectly and logically, although perhaps not more briefly.

In the first place, the existence of God is proved by the universal consciousness of mankind. There are no nations or tribes of men on the face of the earth, however degraded, but have tradition and belief in a great First Cause. Are you prepared to assert that the witness of this universal consciousness is a lie? It is almost intuitive, this perception of a personal cause, and reasoning from the known premises of mind and matter to the logical conclusion, there is no truth of philosophy so confirmed as the existence of a personal God.

Secondly, in so far as it is a question of science, the facts of scientific deduction prove the same truth. I have already referred to the argument. There is no more positive assertion uttered by science than that the introduction of life upon this planet was within the reckonings of time. There is nothing more certain. And every fact and every experiment prove with a lavish strength of evidence, direct and indirect, that all life proceeds from life and nothing but life. These two assertions are facts of science. The force of them is self-evident; a living creator must have been the source of life.

Then there is the irrefragable argument so ably elaborated by Paley, the argument from design as it is familiarly called. The wide expanse of nature, the whole universe, organic and inorganic, vegetable, beast, man, rock, earth, water, all bear stamped upon them the evidence of design, and design must ever have a designer. As surely, to use Paley's opening argument, as you could not possibly be convinced that a watch, perfect in its machinery and pointing the correct time, came upon a barren moor by accident or chance, as certainly as you would regard it folly to believe that that watch had no intelligent maker, so equally certain is the conviction upon an honest mind of the existence of a great contriver to the universe. The bones, and veins, and arteries, muscles, and joints, and organs of man, all prove designing intelligence was their maker. The scriptures are scientifically accurate when they assert, "The Lord by wisdom hath founded the earth; by understanding hath he established the heavens; by his knowledge the depths are broken up and the clouds drop down the dew." Take as an example the shape and density of the earth. If it were compressed so that its density was the same as the density of the planet Jupiter, for instance, eleven times as great to men and animals, existence would be intolerable, birds could not fly nor fish swim, the rising of a man from a chair, the closing of his mouth to masticate his food, the lifting of his arm, all would be eleven times more difficult. He would drag himself heavily along through a universe of peril; every apple that fell would endanger his life, rain would similarly threaten wheat and corn and fruit. If the density was lessened to be the same as of Mercury, equally great, although contrary, dangers would threaten him. A puff of wind would blow him down; his limbs would refuse to obey his will, and his life would be suffering and intense pain. In the vegetable kingdom similar havoc would occur. No other reason for the earth's density being as it is can be given than that it is God's will. How wise, then, and how undeniable the contrivance that so accurately adjusted the density of the earth to its surrounding circumstances! So with air, the water, the minerals, everything about us is exactly adjusted to bless our race. Who but an intelligent creator could have shaped such harmony, purity of design, as binds the whole universe in its beneficent sway?

The proof of the existence of the deity is further strengthened by the palpable accommodations of existing laws to carry out a distinct purpose. A very remarkable instance of this is very interestingly traced out in the third chapter of the "Reign of Law," under the caption "Contrivance a Necessity." That instance is the flight of birds. There are three laws which are compelled to serve in the accomplishment of flight, two of which would seem to be absolutely destructive of it. The law of gravitation, the resisting power of the atmosphere, and the elasticity of the air. Now, the force of gravitation, drawing a body toward the earth, and the resistance of the atmosphere, would certainly seem to be impediments incapable of being overturned. Yet they are overcome and made suitable to afford the greatest aid to a bird in its wonderful progress through the air. To insist that there is no evidence here of direct contrivance to fulfil an intelligent purpose is about as sensible as to assert that a steam-engine in motion exhibits no evidence of a maker. Let me make a short review of this evidence.

The weight of a bird is always greater than the air, or else it could not fly, but merely float. The force of gravitation therefore aids it to overcome any lesser force, such as gales of wind, etc., and gives it mastery to direct its movements. But to counteract the attracting force of the earth another law is taken advantage of, and for a successful use of which especial provision is made. The resistance of the air itself is equally strong on every side, so that a body suspended in it, applying this law alone, would have as much difficulty in going forward as in falling. The force of gravity, however, pulls down, and in order to fly, the resistance of the air must be so used that its strength will be to balance the attraction of the earth, and its resistance to a forward motion be made as weak as possible. How exactly the wings of a bird are contrived to accomplish this difficult purpose by their breadth of surface expanded perpendicularly, and by their narrowness horizontally! But the laws used and the mechanical contrivance thus far noted are powerless to maintain flight. The Duke of Argyll proves this by a reference to the experience of all sportsmen that a bird may be shot so as to produce a rigid expansion of the wings, which, however, does not prevent, but only retards and makes gradual, its fall.

The third law—and, mark, it is upon the unchangeableness of these laws that the whole elaborate contrivance is built—the third law of which advantage is taken is the elasticity of the air—its reaction when compressed. To derive the full benefit of this a bird's wings are under the control of muscles of truly extraordinary strength, and they move with such velocity as to be beyond computation. The feathers also serve a distinct purpose, and the size of the bony part of the wing is very wisely adapted; but I shall not have room to elaborate these.

But just here there is another evidence of ingenious contrivance—how shall the wings be made so that the upward stroke of the wing shall not destroy the advantage gained by the downward? The upper side is made convex, the lower concave, so that, as the wing glances upward, the air rolls off, producing comparatively no pressure, while on the downward stroke the air is held together by the concave surface, and the greatest possible impetus given to the rising bird.

There is still another contrivance—the feathers of the wing overlap so that in the downward stroke the upward pressure of the air tightly closes them together upward, while in the up stroke it spreads the feathers and facilitates the escape of the air.

There are other contrivances by which the bird is enabled to go forward, besides many ingenious methods to help the different birds in peculiar circumstances and various pursuits of food, of which I have not space to make a synopsis. The whole chapter would be well worth copying, but in default of space, I flatter myself I have presented sufficient to establish, to all but the wilfully blind, irrefragable evidences of contrivance and a Contriver. I am not forgetful, of course, that the argument from design is fallen out of favor with many, but I cannot but help seeing, to quote from Sir William Thompson's Inaugural before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, that "overwhelmingly strong proofs of intelligent and benevolent design lie all around us;" and he adds, "If ever perplexities, whether metaphysical or scientific, turn us away from them for a time, they come back upon us with irresistible force, showing to us through nature the influence of a free will, and teaching us that all living beings depend on one ever-acting Creator and Ruler."

I suppose you can readily produce objections, some of which I might anticipate, but I deem that the better way is to let you make them first. I will therefore turn my attention to what is more pressingly before us.

It is discouraging to notice how utterly regardless you are of any authority except your own dictum. "Organization and life," you say, "go together, and by nature's laws are produced together." The conclusions of the most eminent scientists are a distinct denial of this statement. Infidel as well as Christian scientists are in harmony here. Prof. Huxley, Prof. Nicholson, Dr. Carpenter, the anatomist Hunter, all agree that life is the cause of organization, not the reverse. Prof. Huxley cites as an illustration of this the "Foraminifera," mere blobs of jelly, without structure or organs of any kind, yet which build an organism the most exquisite and complicated of all the forms of nature. Truly your doctrine needs an exceedingly blind devotion, requiring the denial of settled facts taught even by your own authorities. What I might say personally on the subject is of course valueless, but certainly when to uphold a whim of belief you put yourself in antagonism to Prof. Huxley, without any authorities to support you, it proves the extremes to which you are driven.

In regard to your harsh criticism on my interpretion of the meaning of the expression, "All the kingdoms of the world," I cannot now recall my authority. The Greek work used in Matthew is Kosmos, which usually means the whole world, but its meaning is limited by the word used in Luke, oikoumenas. The revised version translates it in the marginal reading, "The inhabited earth." Writing in haste, I did not stop to verify my authority, but after looking into the matter more thoroughly I must acknowledge that I narrowed the meaning too greatly. The description "exceeding high mountain" is not necessarily false because what might be an exceedingly high mountain to a Jew would not be such to one dwelling in the shadow of the Alps. The common Christian interpretation of the scene will probably, however, be as unacceptable to you as my hastily made translation, viz., that the devil taking Christ to one of the highest mountains of that region causes him by an illusion of the imagination to perceive with his mind, as if he had seen with his eyes—all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them.

In your preface to the quotations from the Vedas the chronology is greatly exaggerated. The highest living authority, Prof. Max Müller, says, "It will be difficult to settle whether the Veda is 'the oldest of books' and whether some portions of the Old Testament may not be traced back to the same or even an earlier date than the oldest hymns of the Veda" (Chips from a German Workshop, vol. i, p. 5). Prof. Whitney, the greatest Sanskrit scholar in America, places the oldest Vedas between 2000 and 1500 B.C. The reader can take his choice between accepting the statements of men like Prof. Müller and Whitney or yours. You may, however, think that a mistake of 1,000 or 1,500 years makes no difference—especially if it seems to carry your point.

I have never denied that the ancient sages did not teach grand truths and high moral duties. But they are obscured by false and puerile chapters that seem more like infantile babblings, particularly in the Vedas. And in the best codes of morals—Buddha's and Confucius's—they are founded on a wrong basis, one on a basis of Atheism doctrinally, and the other teaching moral duties merely between man and man, no higher truths. But the Pentateuch was written before any of these, and teaches a grander morality and higher truths. Of course you have selected the choice portions of the ancient sacred books to contrast with the scripture, and even on your own showing it is not difficult to show that the latter are immeasurably above them. Let me quote continuously a sample of the Vedas. It is the first book of the Khandagya-Upanishad.

FIRST KHANDA.

1. Let a man meditate on the syllable Om, called the udgitha, for the udgitha (a portion of the Sama-veda) is sung, beginning with Om.

The full account, however, of Om is this.

2. The essence of all beings is the earth, the essence of the earth is water, the essence of water the plants, the essence of plants man, the essence of man speech, the essence of speech the Rig-veda, the essence of the Rig-veda the Sama-veda, the essence of the Sama-veda, the udgitha (which is Om).

3. That udgitha (Om) is the best of all essences, the highest, deserving the highest place, the eighth.

4. What then is Rik? What is the Saman? What is the udgitha? This is the question.

5. The Rik indeed is speech, Saman is breath, the udgitha is the syllable Om. Now speech and breath, or Rik and Saman form one couple.

6. And that couple is joined together with the syllable Om. When two people come together they fulfil each other's desire.

7. Thus he who knowing this meditates on the syllable, Om, the udgitha becomes indeed a fulfiller of desires.

8. That syllable is a syllable of permission, for whenever we permit anything we say, Om, yes. Now permission is gratification. He who knowing this meditates on the syllable, Om, the udgitha becomes indeed a gratifier of desires.

9. By that syllable does the threefold knowledge (the sacrifice—more particularly the Soma sacrifices, founded on the three Vedas) proceed. When the Adhvarya priest gives an order he says Om. When the Hatri priest recites he says Om. When the Udgatri priest sings he says Om—all for the glory of that syllable. The threefold knowledge (the sacrifices) proceeds by the greatness of that syllable (the vital breaths), and by its essence (the oblations).

10. Now, therefore, it would seem to follow that he who knows this, and he who does not, perform the same sacrifice. But this is not so, for knowledge and ignorance are different. The sacrifice which a man performs with knowledge, faith, and the Upanishad, is more powerful. This is the full account of the syllable Om.

SECOND KHANDA.

1. When the Devas and Asuras struggled together, both of the race of Pragapate, the Devas took the udgitha (Om), thinking they would vanquish the Asuras with it.

2. They meditated on the udgitha (Om), as the breath in the nose, but the Asuras pierced it with evil. Therefore we smell by the breath of the nose both what is good smelling and what is bad smelling. For the breath was pierced by evil.

3. Then they meditated on the udgitha as speech, but the Asuras pierced it with evil. Therefore we speak both truth and falsehood, for speech is pierced by evil.

4. Then they meditated on the udgitha as the eye, but the Asuras pierced it with evil. Therefore we see what is both sightly and unsightly, for the eye is pierced by evil.

5. Then they meditated on the udgitha as the mind, but the Asuras pierced it with evil. Therefore we conceive both what should be conceived and what should not be conceived, for the mind is pierced by evil.

6. Then they meditated on the udgitha as the ear, but the Asuras pierced it with evil. Therefore we hear both what we should hear and what we should not hear, for the ear is pierced by evil.

7. Then comes this breath (of life) in the mouth. They meditated on the udgitha as that breath. When the Asuras came to it they were scattered as (a ball of earth) would be scattered when hitting a solid stone.

8. Thus as a ball of earth is scattered when hitting on a solid stone, will he be scattered who wishes evil to one who knows this or who persecutes him, for he is a solid stone.

9. By it he distinguishes neither what is good nor what is bad smelling, for that breath is free from evil. What we eat and drink with it supports the other vital breath. When at the time of death he does not find that breath, then he departs. He opens the mouth at the time of death (as if wishing to eat).

10. Angiras meditated on the udgitha as that breath and people hold it to be Angiras; i. e., the essence of the members.

11. Therefore Brihaspati meditated on the udgitha as that breath, and people hold it to be Brihaspati, for speech is brihati, and he (that breath) is lord of speech.

12. Therefore Ayasya meditated on the udgitha, as that breath and people hold it to be Ayasya because it came from the mouth.

13. Therefore Vaka Dalbhya knew it. He was the Udgatri (singer) of Naimishiya-sacrifices, and by singing he obtained for them their wishes.

14. He who knows this and meditates on the syllable Om as the breath of life in the mouth, he obtains all wishes by singing. So much for the udgitha as meditated on with reference to the body.

THIRD KHANDA.

1. Now follows the meditation on the udgitha with reference to the gods. Let a man meditate on the udgitha as he who sends warmth (the sun in the sky). When the sun rises it sings as Udgatri for the sake of all creatures. When it rises it destroys the fear of darkness. He who knows this is able to destroy the fear of darkness (ignorance).

2. This (the breath in the mouth) and that (the sun) are the same. This is hot and that is hot. This they call svara (sound), and that they call pratyasvara (reflected sound). Therefore let a man meditate on the udgitha as this and that.

3. Then let a man meditate on the udgitha as vyana indeed. If we breathe up, that is prava, the upbreathing. If we breathe down, that is apana, the downbreathing. The combination of prana and apana is vyana, backbreathing, or holding in of the breath. This vyana is speech. Therefore when we utter speech we neither breathe up nor down.

4. Speech is Rik, and therefore when a man utters a Rik verse he neither breathes up nor down. Rik is Saman and therefore when a man utters a Saman verse he neither breathes up nor down. Saman is udgitha, and therefore when a man sings (the udgitha, Om) he neither breathes up nor down.

5. And other works also which require strength, such as the production of fire by rubbing, running a race, stringing a strong bow, are performed without breathing up or down. Therefore let a man meditate on the udgitha Om) as vyana.

6. Let a man meditate on the syllables of the udgitha (i. e., of the word udgitha); Ut is breath (prana), for by means of breath a man rises (uttishthati). Gi is speech, for speeches are called Girah. Tha is food, for by means of food all subsist (sthita).

7. Ut is heaven, gi the sky, tha the earth. Ut is the Saman Veda; gi, the Yagur Veda; tha, the Rik Veda. Speech yields the milk, which is the milk of speech itself to him who, thus knowing, meditates on those syllables of the udgitha; he becomes rich in food and able to eat food.

8. Next follows the fulfilment of prayers. Let a man thus meditate on the upasaranas, i. e., the objects which hav to be approached by meditation. Let him (the udgatri) quickly reflect on the Saman with which he is going to praise.

9. Let him quickly reflect on the Rik in which that Saman occurs, on the Rishi (poet) by whom it was seen or composed, on the Devata (object) which he is going to praise, 10, or the meter in which he is going to praise, or the tune with which he is going to sing to himself.

11. On the quarter of the world which he is going to praise. Lastly, having approached himself (his name, family, etc.) by meditation let him sing the hymn of praise, reflecting on his desire, and avoiding all mistakes in pronunciation, etc. Quickly will the desire be then fulfilled to him for the sake of which he may hav offered his hymn of praise, yea, for which he may hav offered his hymn of praise.

FOURTH KHANDA.

1. Let a man meditate on the syllable Om, for the udgitha is sung beginning with Om; and this is the full account of the syllable Om.

2. The Devas, being afraid of death, entered upon (the performance of the sacrifices presented in) the threefold knowledge (the three Vedas). They covered themselves with metrical hymns, therefore the hymns are called Khandas.

3. Then as a fisherman might observe a fish in the water Death observed the Devas in the Rik, Yagus and Saman (sacrifices). And the Devas seeing this rose from the Rik, Yagus and Saman, sacrifices, entered the Svara (i. e., the Om), (they meditated on the Om).

4. When a man has mastered the Rig-veda he says, quite aloud, Om; the same when he has mastered the Saman and the Yagus. This Saman is the imperishable (syllable) the immortal, free from fear. Because the Devas entered it, therefore they became immortal and free from fear.

5. He who knowing this loudly pronounces (prananti) that syllable, the svara, the immortal, free from fear, and having entered it, becomes immortal as the Devas are immortal.

FIFTH KHANDA.

1. The udgitha (Sama-veda) is the pranava (Rig-Veda) the pranava is the udgitha. And as the udgitha is the sun so is the pranava, for he (the sun) goes sounding Om.

2. "Him I sang praises to, therefore thou art my only one," thus said Kaushitaki to his son. "Do thou revolve his rays, then thou wilt have many sons." So much in reference to the Devas.

3. Now with reference to the body. Let a man meditate on the udgitha as the breath (in the mouth) for he goes sounding Om.

4. "Him I sang praises to, therefore art thou my only son," thus said Kaushitaka to his son. "Do thou therefore sing praises to the breath as manifold if thou wishest to have many sons."

5. He who knows that the udgitha is the pranava, and the pranava is the udgitha, rectifies from the seat of the Hatri priest any mistake committed by the udgatri priest in performing the udgitha, yea, in performing the udgitha.

SIXTH KHANDA.

The Rik (veda) is the earth; the Saman (veda) is fire. This Saman (fire) rests on that Rik (earth). Therefore the Saman is sung as resting on the Rik. Sa is the earth, ama is fire, and that makes Sama.

2. The Rik is the sky, the Saman air. This Saman (air) rests on that Rik (sky). Therefore the Saman is sung as resting on the Rik. Sa is the sky, ama air, and that makes Saman.

3. Rik is heaven, Saman the sun. This Saman, (sun) rests on that Rik (heaven). Therefore the Saman is sung as resting on the Rik. Sa is heaven, ama sun, and that makes Saman.

4. Rik is the stars, Saman the moon. This Saman, (moon) rests on that Rik (stars). Therefore the Saman is sung as resting on the Rik. Sa is the stars, ama the moon, and that makes Saman.

5. Rik is the white light of the sun, Saman the blue exceeding darkness (in the sun). This Saman, (darkness) rests on that Rik (brightness). Therefore the Saman is sung as resting on the Rik.

6. Sa is the white light of the sun, ama the blue exceeding darkness, and that makes Saman.

Now that golden person who is seen within the sun with golden beard and golden hair, golden altogether to the very tips of his nails.

7. Whose eyes are like the blue lotus's, his name is ut, for he has risen (udita) above all evil. He also who knows this rises above all evil.

8. Rik and Saman are his joints and therefore he is udgitha. And therefore he who praises him (the ut) is called the Udgatri (outsinger). He (the golden person called ut) is lord of the worlds beyond that (sun), and of all wishes of the Devas, inhabiting those worlds. So much with reference to the Devas.

SEVENTH KHANDA

1. Now with reference to the body. Rik is speech, Saman breath. This Saman (breath) rests on Rik, (speech). Sa is speech, ama is breath, and that makes Sama.

2. Rik is the eye, Saman the self. This Saman (the self) rests on that Rik (the eye). Sa is the eye ama the self, and that makes Sama.

3. Rik is the ear, Saman the mind. This Saman (the mind) rests on that Rik (the ear). Sa is the ear ama the mind, and that makes Sama.

4. Rik is the white light of the eye, Saman the blue exceeding darkness. This Saman (darkness) rests on that Rik (white light). Sa is the white light, ama the blue exceeding darkness, and that makes Sama.

5. Now the person who is seen in the eye, he is Rik, he is Saman, Uktha, Yagus, Brahman. The form of that person (in the eye) is the same as the form of the other person (in the sun) the joints of the one, Rik and Saman, and the joints of the other, the name (ut) of the one is the name of the other.

6. He is lord of the worlds beneath that (the self in the eye) and of all the wishes of men. Therefore, all who sing to the vina (lyre) sing him and from him also they obtain wealth.

7. He who knowing this, sings a Saman, sings to both (the Adhidvaivata and Adhyatma self) the person in the sun and the person in the eye, and one of the same person. He obtains through the one, yea, he obtains the worlds beyond that and the wishes of the Devas.

8. And he obtains through the other world beneath that and the wishes of men.

Therefore an udgatri priest who knows this may say (to the sacrificer for whom he officiates),

9. "What wish shall I obtain for you by my songs?" For he who knowing this sings a Saman is able to obtain wishes through his song, yea, through his song.

EIGHTH KHANDA.

1. There were once three men well versed in udgitha, Silaka Salavatya, Kaikitayana Dalbhya, and Pravahana Gaivali. They said, "We are well versed in udgitha. Let us have a discussion on udgitha."

2. They all agreed and sat down. Then Pravahana Gaivali said, "Sirs, do you both speak first, for I wish to hear what two Brahmanas have to say."

3. Then Silaka Salavatya said to Kaikitayana Dalbhya, "Let me ask you." "Ask," he replied.

4. "What is the origin of Saman?" "Tone," he replied.

"What is the origin of tone?" "Breath," he replied.

"What is the origin of breath?" "Food," he replied.

"What is the origin of food?" "Water," he replied.

"What is the orgin of water?" "That world (heaven)," he replied.

"And what is the origin of that world?"

5. He replied, "Let no man carry the Saman beyond the world of svarga (heaven). We place (recognize) the Saman in the world of svarga, for the Saman is extolled as svarga (heaven).

6. Then said Silaka Salavatya to Kaikitayana Dalbhya: "O Dalbhya, thy Saman is not firmly established. And if any one were to say, 'Your head shall fall off' (if you be wrong) surely your head would now fall."

7. "Well, then, let me know this from you, sir," said Dalbhya. "Know it," replied Silaka Salavatya.

"What is the origin of that world?" (heaven).

"This world," he replied.

"And what is the origin of this world?"

He replied, "Let no man carry the Saman beyond this world as its rest. We place the Saman in this world as its rest, for the Saman is extolled as rest."

8. Then said Pravahana Gaivali to Silaka Salavatya: "Your Saman (the earth) O Salvatya, has an end. And if any one were to say, 'Your head shall fall off' (if you be wrong) surely your head would now fall."

"Well, then, let me know this from you sir," said Salavatya. "Know it," replied Gaivali.

NINTH KHANDA.

1. "What is the origin of this world?" "Ether," he replied. For all these beings take their use from the ether, and return into the ether. Ether is older than these; ether is their rest.

2. He is indeed the udgitha (Om-Brahman) greater than the great (parovariyas); he is without end.

He who knowing this meditates on the udgitha, the greater than great, obtains what is greater than the great; he conquers the worlds which are greater than the great.

3. Atidhanvan Saunaka having taught this udgitha to Udara Sandilya said: "As long as they will know in your family this udgitha, their life in this world will be greater than great.

4. "And this also will be their state in the other world." He who thus knows the udgitha and meditates on it thus, his life in this world will be greater than great, and also his state in the other world, yea, in the other world.

TENTH KHANDA.

1. When the Kurus had been destroyed by hail (stones) Ushasti Kakrayana lived as a beggar with his virgin wife at Ibbyagrama.

2. Seeing a chief eating beans, he begged of him. The chief said, "I have no more except those which are put away for me here."

3. Ushasti said, "Give me to eat of them." He gave him the beans, and said, "There is something to drink also." Then said Ushasti, "If I drink of it I should have drunk what was left by another, and is therefore unclean.

4. The chief said, "Were not those beans left over, and therefore unclean?" "No," he replied, "for I should not have lived if I had not eaten them, but the drinking of water would be mere pleasure."

5. Having eaten himself, Ushasti gave the remaining beans to his wife. But she, having eaten before, took them and put them away.

6. Rising the next morning, Ushasti said to her: "Alas, if we could only get some food we might gain a little wealth. The king here is going to offer a sacrifice. He should choose me for all the priestly offices."

7. His wife said to him, "Look, here are those beans of yours." Having eaten them he went to the sacrifice which was being performed.

8. He went and sat down in the orchestra near the Udgatris who were going to sing their hymns of praise. And he said to the prastotri (leader).

9. "Prastotri, if you, without knowing the deity, who belongs to the prastava (the hymns, etc., of the Prastotri), are going to sing it, your head will fall off."

10. In the same manner he addressed the Udgatri: "Udgatri, if you, without knowing the deity who belongs to the udgatha (the hymns, etc., belonging to the Udgatri), are going to sing it, your head will fall off."

11. In the same manner he addressed the Pratihantri: "Pratihantri, if you, without knowing the deity who belongs to the pratihara, the hymns, etc., belonging to the Pratihantri, are going to sing it, your head will fall off."

They stopped and sat down in silence.

ELEVENTH KHANDA.

1. Then the sacrificer said to him, "I should like to know who you are, sir?" He replied, "I am Ushasti Kakrayana."

2. He said, "I looked for you, sir, for all these sacrificial offices, but not finding you, I chose others.

3. "But now, sir, take all the sacrificial offices." Ushasti said: "Very well, but let those, with my permission, perform the hymns of praise. Only as much wealth as you give to them, so much give to me also."

The sacrificer assented.

4. Then the Prastotri approached him, saying: "Sir, you said to me, 'Prastotri, if you, without knowing the deity which belongs to the prastana, are going to sing it, your head will fall off.' Which, then, is that deity?"

5. He said, "Breath, prana, for all these beings merge into breath alone, and from breath they arise. This is the deity belonging to the prastana. If, without knowing the deity, you had sung forth your hymn, your head would have fallen off after you had been warned by me."

6. Then the Udgatri approached him, saying: "Sir, you said to me, 'Udgatri, if you, without knowing the deity which belongs to the udgitha, are going to sing it, your head will fall off.' Which, then, is that deity?"

7. He said: "The sun, aditya, for all these beings praise the sun when it stands high. This is the deity belonging to the Udgitha. If, without knowing the deity, you had sung forth your hymns, your head would have fallen off after you had been warned by me."

8. Then the Pratihanti approached him, saying, "Sir, you said to me, 'Pratihanti, if you without knowing the deity which belongs to the pratihara, are going to sing it, your head will fall off." Which then is that deity?"

9. He said: "Food (anna). For all these beings live when they partake of food. This is the deity which belongs to the pratihara. If without knowing the deity you had sung forth your hymn your head would have fallen off, after you had been warned by me."

TWELFTH KHANDA.

1. Now follows the udgitha of the dogs. Vaka Dalbhya, or as he was called, Glava Maitreya, went out to repeat the Vedas (in a quiet place).

2. A white (dog) appeared before him, and other dogs gathering round him, said to him, "Sir, sing and get us food, we are hungry."

3. The white dog said, "Come to me to-morrow morning." Vaka Dalbhya, or as he was also called Glava Maitreya, watched.

4. The dogs came on, holding together, each keeping the tail of the preceding dog in his mouth, as the priests do when they are going to sing praises with the Vahishpavamana-hymy. After they had settled down they began to say, "H'm, Om, let us eat, Om, let us drink; Om, may the divine Varuna, Pragapati, Savitri, bring us food; Lord of food, bring hither food, bring it, Om!"

THIRTEENTH KHANDA.

1. The syllable Han is the world (the earth); the syllable Hai, the air; the syllable Atha, the moon; the syllable Iha, self; the syllable I is Agni, fire.

2. The syllable U is the sun; the syllable E is the Nihavi or invocation; the syllable Auhoi is the Vesve Deva; the syllable Hm is the Pragapati, Svara (tone) is breath (prana); the syllable Yu is food; the syllable Vag is Virag.

3. The thirteenth stobha syllable, viz., the indistinct Hm is the undefinable (the highest Brahman).

4. Speech yields the milk, which is the milk of speech itself to him who knows this Upanishad (sweet doctrine) of the Samans in this wise. He becomes rich in food and able to eat food, yea, able to eat food.

Will you insist that writings containing such chapters and books as these are at all comparable to the Bible? Is there anything in the Bible so trivial and absurd? The greatest of men have delighted to honor the Bible as excelling human genius in every department. Shakspere and Milton, Bacon and Newton, Locke and Addison, Sir Wm. Jones, Faraday, Dawson, Havelock, the highest human intellect, have found in the Bible that which excelled every other book or production of man. But it is not so with any you adduce. Prof. Müller says, "Readers who have been led to believe that the Veda of the ancient Brahmans, the Avesta of the Zoroastrians, the Tripitaka of the Buddhists, the Kings of Confucius, or the Koran of Mohammed are books of primeval wisdom and religious enthusiasm, or at least of sound and simple moral teaching, will be disappointed on consulting these volumes."

But I must conclude here, reserving further remarks for my next. G. M. MAIR.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY AT $3.00 PER YEAR.

The largest and cheapest Radical Journal published in Europe or America, containing nearly seven hundred square inches more of reading matter than any other journal of its kind.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1881.

In About Four Weeks

From this date we expect to sail for Europe on our long journey round the world. We are sincerely grateful to those who hav so generously contributed toward furnishing the means to pay the expenses of the journey. We shall never forget their generosity while we remember anything, and will cheerfully furnish them with the volumes we propose to write during our absence, and which we hope to some extent will compensate for the advances made.

We would take this occasion to say that there are nearly one hundred and forty names in the list of friends who pledged to send us a "V" to help us on the journey who hav not yet remitted. We do not wish to urge the payment of such sums, but will simply remark that we do not like to leave without having sufficient funds to carry us around and bring us home again. The more we inform ourselvs of the probable expenses of the long journey, with the numerous digressions we wish to make in the various countries to be visited, we are more and more convinced that our first estimate of the expense was quite too small. We request all the friends who hav pledged to remit with as much promptness as circumstances will allow. If there are others who feel like adding their names to the honorable list of donors and contribute five dollars to help us circumnavigate, we hope they will not be bashful. If we hav failed to place an asterisk to any who hav remitted, will they be kind enough to inform us of the fact?

Change in Title.

By special request we hav changed the title of our letters from Europe from "An Infidel Abroad" to "A Truth Seeker in Europe." Several hav objected to the first name because they wished to lend the volume to Christians who almost shudder at the name of Infidel. To humor such prejudices we hav made the change. We hav just brought out another edition with the new title, and as some of the first edition are still on hand, patrons can be accommodated with either "An Infidel Abroad" or "A Truth Seeker in Europe."

Charles Bradlaugh.

We see by the National Reformer that Mr. Bradlaugh is hard at work delivering speeches and addresses in various parts of England touching the great injustice that has been done him in excluding him from the seat in Parliament to which he has twice been honestly elected. He is meeting with most enthusiastic receptions in the various points he visits, and the people seem fully aroused with indignation at the bigotry and religious tyranny which is depriving him of the position to which he is justly entitled, and preventing him from pushing the reforms to which his heart is wedded. The sympathy of thousands of true Englishmen is interested in his favor; public sentiment is manifesting itself in his behalf, and the sense of justice which is thus growing must ultimately place him where his constituents sent him.

WE hav just received a new shipment of books from London, among which are a pretty full supply of Bradlaugh's and Mrs. Besant's works, and also Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" in two volumes at $3, and "Voltaire's Romances"—very Voltairish—at $1.50.

COMSTOCK, THE SPY.—This notorious character has again put in an appearance at Albany, with a view of heading off legislation which is inimical to his mode of action. The following dispatch was sent to one of our daily papers: "ALBANY, June 13th.—Tony Comstock turned up here again this morning and has been moving so much of the earth as is at his disposal to defeat Col. Murphy's Anti-Spy bill. Unless men are prone to lying, the chances for the bill passing the Senate to-morrow are good, provided that order of business is not shut off.

Literary Notices.

The Religion of Common Sense. By Prof. Liebrecht Uhlich, of Germany. Translated by Mrs. Weenink-Ilioham, of Albany, N. Y. Price, 25 cents.

This little pamphlet is chock full of sensible matter, with no superstition or theological nonsense. The lady who translated and published it was moved to do so by reading the following in the Albany Evening Journal from the Rev. Howard Crosby, a distinguished clergyman of this city: "We want God's word infused into the minds of men as the only force that can withstand the chilling easterly winds sweeping over from the universities of Holland and Germany, threatening by false logic, unfair criticism, blighting skepticism, and satanic cunning to undermine our blessed Bible, from which comes all our knowledge of divine things, and on which does rest all our hopes." After reading this the lady, being a native of Holland, felt anxious to show to the people of America that the universities of Europe alluded to do not deal in "satanic cunning," and do not attempt to "undermine" any real truth. In explaining why the pamphlet is published, she closes thus: "The reader will find this little book to be a help in teaching him in plain, brief terms how to work for that kingdom that will bless mankind. Its simplicity will enable the least educated to comprehend its meaning, and I will be amply rewarded for the translation if it is as gladly received as in Holland and Germany."

A few brief paragraphs taken from the little volume show the good quality of all of it:

"The universe is immensely large. Nobody can say when to stop, for if we think a limit, then we ask, What is behind that again? Neither can we imagine the beginning of all this nor the end. We cannot comprehend a time when nothing existed, neither that it will all pass away. We call this an everlasting universe.

"In all things we observe a power. In everything we notice law. Everything is in motion and constantly changing. All work together and through each other, therefore we can say everything has its life. The universe has life, and all is connected together.

"Creatures are formed out of the earth, return again to the earth, are a part of the whole, and this earth is our abiding-place. Therefore we should try to know this earth; it is our privilege; we are human beings, enabled to do it; many creatures cannot, and it should be our pleasure to find out the real state of things.

"Out of the past we hav information of five thousand years ago. Perhaps mankind existed much longer, but on acconnt of their rough and uneducated state we hav no information, as they very likely lived as the wild races.

"Somewhere there has been a first pair of human beings, or perhaps more than one couple. However, we cannot tell, for since thousands of years we descended from one couple, but perhaps more couples.

"Men had to learn everything they know by themselvs; only the foundation was laid; just like a seed has the capacity to form a stem, leaf, blossom, and fruit. It is very important to form an idea how they gradually learned to speak and care for themselvs; how they prepared food, clothing, and builded their houses, tamed animals, plowed the soil, learned trades and works of art.

"Long ago people began to make certain rules, according to which they intended to liv. All these rules together they called religion. They observed a power higher than themselvs, to whom they submitted, and from whom these rules descended. This power they called God."

The work is well adapted for the use of young people and those who hav just begun to see the errors of theology. While it teaches natural truths, it does so in a manner offensiv to none.

Unmasked; or, The Science of Immortality. By a Woman Physician. To gentlemen. Wm. H. Boyd, Philadelphia.

This is a remarkable volume of plain and practical truths to the men of this country, touching the relations of the sexes and the manner of life they ought to lead. It is not uncommon for physicians of the male persuasion to write books especially for females to read, but it is quite unusual for works by female physicians to be gotten up especially for gentlemen, as is the one under consideration.

The chapters treated are as follows: 1. Introduction; 2. Equality; 3. Pure Manhood; 4. Hermaphrodites; 5. Morning Sickness of Men; 6. Kissing; 7. Hymens; 8. Seminal Weakness; 9. Barrenness; 10. Social Evil; 11. Hernia; 12. The Language of the Nerves.

There is far more valuable information imparted in this volume than is contained in thousands of larger works. Price, $1.

The Golden Mean in Temperance and Religion. A lecture by John E. Burton.

This author is among the newer advocates of the truth, and his ability givs promise of great usefulness. This lecture contains a generous fund of useful information on religious topics and valuable hints and common-sense suggestions on eating, drinking, thinking, and living.

The Inspiration of Bibles. By the same author.

This is No. 2 of his series of lectures. He says at the outset: "It is time humanity was weaned. Men should not remain boys forever. Santa Claus religion has performed its part in the mission of our race. If Bibles were written by God, they would not need inspiration to convince men of their truth and beauty any more than the rainbow. Nothing needs inspiration from a god except superstition and falsehood. Truth will stand without inspiration from gods or men, and better still will stand in spite of them all. The stars, the flowers, the mountainous peaks, the sea foam, and the sunlight are from God, and hence need no inspiration to excite the love and gratitude of man." This lecture is rich in truth, facts, and common sense. We wish the author great success in his new field of labor.

False Imprisonment of Mrs. Elizabeth R. Hill by Rev. Gabriel H. De Bevoise and the Selectmen of North Brookfield, Mass. Written by herself.

This is a detailed account of the great wrongs done a worthy widow lady by evil-minded men, who, to prevent her recovering damages done to her property by a railroad, and for other reasons, was represented to be insane, and was confined in an insane asylum. Even now she is an exile from a pleasant home lest she again be sent to that horrible place worse than a prison. Her case is a touching one, and her book is well calculated to impress the truth upon the reader that bad men still exercise power in the old state of Massachusetts.

Price, 50 cents.

The American Weekly. John W. Hertwig, editor and proprietor. St. Louis, Mo.

An eight-page weekly devoted to Radicalism and American affairs and interests. It discusses public questions of importance and upholds the principle of equal rights to all in matters of public concern.

The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are not unacquainted with the writings of Mr. Hertwig, as he has often contributed to its columns. He is a writer of ability, possessing clear and well-defined convictions, and is a radical and a thinker in the various moral reforms. May his journalistic enterprise prove a success. Price, $2.50 a year; six months, $1.25. Address John George Hertwig, 915 North Sixth street, St. Louis, Mo.

Mirror of Progress.

We hav omitted to note the change of editors in this sprightly Liberal sheet. Mr. D. Eccles has withdrawn from the paper and Mrs. Mattie Hulett Krekel is now sole editor. She is an able and deserving worker in the Liberal field, and we hope the Liberals of America will generously sustain her in her arduous labors.

Round the World Fund.

The following persons hav pledged five dollars each (one share) to help take THE TRUTH SEEKER editor round the world. Those preceded by an asterisk (*) hav already paid. Those not paid will oblige by remitting promptly. Two or three volumes of the book descriptiv of the journey will be issued to each contributor as soon as ready.

Our sincere thanks are extended to those friends who hav kindly sent in their five dollars to help us around the world. We trust none will regret the investment. If those not having a star attached to their name will allow us to add one, we will be obliged to them. The sooner the stars are attached to every name the sooner we will be ready to start on the long journey.

Grove Meeting.

There will be a grove meeting under the auspices of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists on Sunday, June 26, 1881, on the boating ground at Four Mile Lake, four miles west of Paw Paw. Cephas B. Lynn, of Massachusetts, and Geo. H. Geer, of Minnesota, are engaged as speakers. A ten-cent admission fee for each adult will be taken at the gate to defray expenses.

L. S. BURDICK, Pres.

E. L. WARNER, Sec., Paw Paw, Mich.

Friends of Progress.

The twenty-third meeting of the Friends of Progress has just closed its session, and I am deputed to send you a short report of its proceedings. The meeting was large and enthusiastic. H. L. Green was chairman and Charles Bonnell secretary; Mrs. Colby was the speaker and Mrs. Smith gave us the music. No one acquainted with these women need be informed that they deal with human wrongs in a manner that cannot be misunderstood. I know no speaker now before the public so fearlessly outspoken as Mrs. Colby, her words being always full of meaning. Mrs. Smith sings as Mrs. Colby speaks, well.

I send you the resolutions adopted unanimously. I think, perhaps, some of your readers may be surprised, and turn back as they read them, to see if they were right in supposing the chairman to hav been the same one who left the "league" in Chicago because of resolutions passed by a large majority of delegates there in session. A year's time makes great changes in one's views, and I am not disposed to question or find fault with motivs. "To one's own conscience each stands or falls."

These are the resolutions:

Resolved, That tbis meeting fully indorses and adopts as its own the sentiment expressed in the resolutions adopted at the indignation meetings recently held in Buffalo and Syracuse regarding the closing of the mails against publications expressing sentiments not in accordance with views at the present time considered orthodox; and further,

Resolved, That the "New York Society for the Suppression of Vice" has proved itself a society for the instigation and encouragement of crime, by allowing its chief agent, Anthony Comstock, to use decoy letters and perpetrate fraud to tempt the unwary into the commission of acts indecent and criminal; and,

Resolved, That reformers should demand as an imperativ right liberty to every individul to freely utter, publish, and transmit by mail his or her honest thought upon all subjects of human welfare, whether such thought is in accordance with popular opinion or otherwise.

Resolved, That the logic is incomprehensible to us that says that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and then taxes and punishes woman while depriving her of opportunity to express her consent of dissent at the polls.

Resolved, That the legislator who assumes to dictate to his constituents the kind of medical practice which they shall employ, by making illegal the use of remedies not heretofore known and stigmatizing the men and women who use and practice with such remedies as persons to be dealt with by fines and other unjust usage, proves himself a bigot too narrow for this time and age, and should he again ask for election at the polls should be rejected as one who insulted the intelligence of a free people.

Resolved, That the place to correct political abuses is at the polls, and experience has proved that liberty is unsafe in the hands of the average politician while he depends upon the support of ecclesiastics and monopolists. Neither of the great political parties now existing dares to jeopardize success by nominating candidates who, under all circumstances, dare to be true to liberty, and under their legislation personal liberty is being insidiously undermined. We therefore declare our belief that the time has fully come when safety demands the organization of a liberty party that will dare to be just though the "heavens fall."

Faithfully, LUCY N. COLMAN.

Explanatory, but Not Apologetic.

In the controversy between myself and others on the Junius question I hav been accused of a personal assault on Col. Ingersoll. The only possible basis for the accusation is the fact that I challenged the Colonel to prove Junius "a coward and a sneak." He has not done it, nor did I expect he would even if he thought he could. The fact is, he always believed that Francis was Junius (as is evident from his introduction to "Modern Thinkers"), and if so, Francis was as contemptible a wretch as ever had greatness thrust upon him against his vehement protest at the age of seventy-two. But if Paine was Junius, then Col. Ingersoll will not deny that he has calumniated him nor censure me for vigorously defending my client.

I hav been severely denounced for making out Jefferson a liar—as if the fathers of the republic, like the fathers of the church, were any more immaculate than the great political and ecclesiastical lights of to-day! But it is remarkable that all my adversaries, with one accord, hav characterized Junius as a liar, and some of them say the same of Paine. If they are so ready to vindicate the character of Jefferson, am I the chief of sinners for maintaining the integrity of Junius and Paine? W. H. B.

Washington, D. C., June 9, 1881.

HE who, when goodness is impressivly put before him, exhibits an instinctiv loyalty to it, starts forward to take its side, and trusts himself to it, such a man has faith, and the root of the matter is in him. He may hav habits of vice, but the loyal and faithful instinct will place him above many who practice virtue.—Ecce Homo.

SCATTERED about in the writings of the apostle Paul there are some admirable maxims of conduct, extremely similar in tone to those of Jesus (and also not unlike many of the maxims of Buddha, Confucius, etc). Thus, he tells his fellow-Christians to be kindly affectionate to one another, to bless those that persecute them—to bless and not to curse, to return no man evil for evil, to giv food to a hungry and drink to a thirsty one, and generally not to be overcome by evil, but to overcome evil by good. (Rom. xii, 10–21: 1 Thes. v, 15). It were much to be wished that Paul himself had remembered these beneficent rules or conduct in the case of Alexander the coppersmith, who, he says, did him "much evil," and concerning whom he utters the significant prayer that the Lord may reward him according to his works (2 Tim. iv, 14).—Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief."

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

A SUMMARY OF THE GODLY GRANDMOTHERS AND MOTHERS OF MARY, JOSEPH, AND JESUS.

This review of the Virgin Mary cannot be dismissed without calling especial attention to eight of the famous historical women that have been considered, who were the wives and mothers of the male ancestors of Joseph, or, as alleged, of Jesus, though, as has been shown, there is no proof that he descended from them through Mary, yet Joseph may have done so. Nevertheless, it is very important, as the claim is set up that Jesus is the only begotten son of God, or the "very God," that the line through which he came should be preserved intact, and the blessed women comprising his maternal pedigree particularly specified; hence this recapitulation.

Besides, we are told (John viii, 41) that the Jews boastingly taunted Jesus with, "We be not born of fornication; we have one father, even God."

Let us examine the pedigree of the Jews and see if this assertion is not false. Not only the women, but the men in this sacred line were notorious, recorded liars, fornicators, and adulterers, and the latter polygamists and drunkards also."

It will be remembered that most of these godly women and holy men would not stand the test of criticism by any rules of morality known to-day, either human or divine, so called, yet it seems that these very worst characters were selected by the God of the universe through whom to born himself in the person of his son.

Then, first, to begin with Eve, who, it is said, was named thus by Adam because she was the mother of all living (Gen. iii, 20), no very bad traits of character were manifested through her, yet she is accused of being the cause of all the evil in the world through disobedience, when it appears by the Bible account she did not disobey God at all, as the command was given to Adam before she was made, and there is no reason to suppose that God told her not to eat his apples of knowledge, so we will excuse her and pass on to Sarah, who was the wife of Abraham and the mother of Isaac. She was rather a bad example for wives to follow, yet God chose these two to be the parents of "the child of promise," that he might raise up to himself a "peculiar people in whom shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," and from whom should come the messiah to save his people from their sins, and the whole human race also. Abraham, the father of the faithful, was a liar, polygamist, and would-be murderer of this son, and Sarah shared his deceit and lies in the case of his twice denying her as his wife, and abusing poor Hagar, herself the cause of Abraham taking her to wife.

Rebecca was the wife of her cousin Isaac, and the mother of Jacob. Her participation in a similar deception as her husband's mother, Sarah, will not be forgotten. But the crowning glory of this treacherous wife and artful mother was the deception she compelled her youngest son to practice on the blind old doting husband and father in order to steal the blessing from his elder brother Esau. Was she not a pretty woman to be the grandmother of the twelve patriarchs? Like mother, or ancestry, like sons, was fully exemplified in her and in Jewish history. These men were no better than their wives, mothers, and daughters, but of them we are not now treating.

Leah, of mandrake fame, was the wife of Jacob and the mother of Judah. Her sister Rachel and the two concubines in the rear were the mothers of the twelve patriarchs. These estimable sister-wives were always quarreling and lying about and to their own husband and father, and were therefore worthy to be in the category of God's female ancestry.

Tamar was the daughter-in-law of Judah, not his wife, by whom was begotten in illicit harlotry by the wayside, Pharez and Zerah, twins. Pharez was eminently distinguished, occupying the rank of Judah's second son, the former husband of Tamar. Judah gave the name to the tribe, and was the fourth son of Jacob. Through this illegitimate son by his daughter-in-law the blessed savior came. The lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, alone prevailed to open the book and loose the seven seals thereof (Rev. v, 5). Old Jacob, just before his death, blessed the twelve sons, leaning on the top of his staff, giving preëminence to Judah over all his brethren. Bible mongers say because the redeemer was to descend through this tribe, and that he prophesied of that event in these words, "The scepter shall not depart from Judah nor a lawgiver from between his feet till Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. xlix, 10), Jacob then and there called Judah "a lion" and gave him other significant titles in token of anticipated kingly powers, both temporal and spiritual. The "promised land" bore his name, Judea, David and the succession of kings in his line; "but above all," says Jamieson, "the messiah sprung from it" (the tribes); yes, he might have added, through this illicit connection of the grand old patriarch with his daughter-in-law Tamar, for Pharez was the primogenitor, after Judah, of the tribe! How could the Jews boast, including Jesus, "We are not born of fornication?" None but of the tribe of Judah could be truly called Jews; they were a nation of Hebrews. Please read Genesis xxxviii, and there refresh your minds in regard to the character of Judah and Tamar, from whence sprang this powerful ally of Jehovah, without which no David, no Solomon, no Jesus, no Savior. Without that illegitimate child, Pharez, without Tamar, there could have been no redemption in Israel or out of Israel, so we must be thankful for bawds in olden times and reverence them and their paramours as God's instruments of salvation from sin and the establishment of a pure government on earth, a final millennium, and a seat at the right hand of God forevermore.

We have dwelt longer here than may seem warrantable by some, but we desired to fix in the mind of the reader the fact that the tribe of Judah of whom, it is said, prophecy declared Jesus should come, was not much of a tribe after all, its existence depending upon a woman playing the harlot with her father-in-law and being so crafty as to escape death by fire at his hands, which having occurred, no illegitimate twins could have been born, no Pharez, no tribe transmitted (for Shelah, his other son, was nobody, nor nothing), no David, no Solomon, no god-man on earth, and, as far as we can see, no Jesus in heaven at the right hand of the father to intercede for us "miserable sinners!" Deplorable condition! all avoided by Tamar seducing old Judah and being smart enough to keep his pledges, in anticipation of the event she apprehended—the burning by fire, according to Hebrew law, executed by the patriarch Judah himself.

Five successive generations from Pharez, in the same line, the genealogy reaches Salmon. His wife was the notorious "Rahab the harlot," or Rechab, and they were the parents of the renowned Boaz. What an interesting history that traitorous, Canaanitish harlot-mother possessed! Her son must have been proud of her. Boaz married Ruth the Moabitess, and they were the parents of Obed. She caught her husband by lying down at his feet in the threshing-floor, secretly. And who was Ruth? From whence did she descend? As her title indicates, from Moab. And who was Moab? The son of drunken, incestuous Lot by his eldest daughter; the same is the father of the Moabites until this day (Gen. xix, 27).

Obed was the father of Jesse and Jesse the father of David. The names of the wives of Obed and Jesse unknown. Not so with David; the names of some eight or nine are given, besides numerous wives and concubines unknown.

Bathsheba is the only wife of David with which we have anything to do in this genealogy. Through this adulterous, bloody connection the polygamous old or young rascal, the man after God's own heart, the sweet singer of Israel, became the father of four sons, of whom Solomon and Nathan are only conspicuous in history, or needed in this genealogy. Matthew states (chapter i, 16) that Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ, was begotten by Jacob twenty-eight generations from David through his son Solomon. Luke declares (chap. iii, 23), "Jesus, being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli," not Jacob, and runs the genealogy back forty-three generations instead of tweny-eight, to David's son Nathan, instead of Solomon, as does Matthew! Here are three mammoth contradictions! Which of David's sons was it, Solomon or Nathan? Was Joseph's father Jacob or Heli? It could not be both. If there were but twenty-eight generations there could not have been also forty-three? And still another discrepancy—a fourth—no two names in the accounts agree except the first and last! Wonderful accuracy in the word of God! David and Bathsheba being the parents of both Solomon and Nathan, it matters not as far as our purpose is concerned in tracing Mary, Joseph, and Jesus, through these two disreputable parents, which of the boys, Sol or Nat were the remote progenitors of the holy child Jesus; but for historical purposes it makes a great difference. Remember, we have no proof that Mary came through that line, and consequently are all afloat in regard to the earthly pedigree of Jesus. We know not, historically, where to place her, so can only say, Mary, the cousin of Elizabeth, which latter was of the daughters of Aaron and consequently of the tribe of Levi. Poor Mary, we don't know as she had any parents. She might have been the child of an uncle and aunt! "Perhaps," Topsy-like, she "growed." Who knows? Her character may be deemed by some beyond question, but a young miss espoused to a lover would not be considered above suspicion nowadays were she to entertain a male angel, become pregnant during the interview, and conceal the whole matter from her espoused husband.

Here are eight women—Sarah, Rebecca, Leah, Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba, and Mary—who, as wives and mothers in the direct line from Abraham to Joseph, with their equally-illustrious spouses, were chosen by the Almighty through whom to incarnate himself! Could he have found a worse lot? It is doubtful! What say the commentators and professors in reference to these facts? Why, they blame Sarah, and excuse the deceitful, lying old tyrant, coward, polygamist Abraham. They gloss over the conduct of Rebecca by declaring that "she was made acquainted of the purpose of God, regarding the children [Jacob and Esau] before they were born" (Rom. ix, 10), therefore her lies were only God's instruments in his election plan that "the elder should serve the younger."

Leah is not considered remarkably godly, though through her—the hated wife—the messiah came, instead of through Rachel or one of the handmaidens.

Jamieson, in attempting to slide as silently and secretly as possible over the disgraceful account of Judah and Tamar, says: "This chapter [Gen. xxxviii, in which the holy farce is related] contains some details which probably would never have obtained a place in the inspired record had it not been to exhibit the full links of the chain that connects the genealogy of the savior with Abraham, and in the disreputable character of the ancestry who figure in this passage, we have a remarkable proof that 'he made himself of no reputation.'"

Volumes might be written on this foolish admission. Was that the way we are to understand that Jesus had "no reputation" because of his vile ancestry? So this learned commentator insinuates, consoling himself with "sour grapes" or "Hobson's choice" because of a disgusting chapter and genealogy. But after all, there is more truth than poetry in the admission, as Jesus always sat down with wine-bibbers and seemed to prefer the company of publicans and sinners to decent, respectable people, saying, "The publicans and harlots go into the kingdom of God before you" (Matt. xxi, 31). Wonder if he was acquainted with his own pedigree, or why he was so attracted to the baser sort of people? Jamieson's admission is no compliment to the son of God, neither to Bible apologists, that such an indecent chapter "would never have obtained a place in the inspired record" but for the reason alleged, the alleged reason itself being more than sufficient to condemn the claim of any immaculate ancestry for Joseph, Mary, or Jesus Christ, or even a decent, respectable parentage.

The same commentator comes out boldly in regard to Rahab, who was justified by her bad works, and always designated by "Rahab the harlot," saying: "Many expositors, desirous of removing the stigma of this name from an ancestress of the savior (Matt. i, 15), have called her a hostess or tavern-keeper. But scriptural usage (and other authorities) establish the propriety of the term employed in our version. . . . A divine influence directed them (the spies) in the choice of that lodging-place." Thus it will be perceived God foreordained that this harlot should be one of his primogenitors!

Smith goes even farther in his assertions that the harlot was a harlot and the "Rachab from which sprung David and eventually Christ." His "suppositions," "probabilities," "possibilities," and "perhapses" are numerous and ingenious, but cannot change the record or the construction of the language with any unprejudiced reader, or the character there portrayed.

A remarkable circumstance in this connection is, as Jamieson says, that "Rachab is here represented as the great-grandmother of David (Ruth iv, 22) and (1 Chron. ii, 11–15) a thing not beyond possibility, but extremely improbable, there being about four centuries between them." So he proceeds to fix up matters by saying, "There can hardly be a doubt that one or two intermediate links are omitted!"

Smith also, in his Dictionary, shortens where he pleases and stretches where he pleases, and then boasts with innocent sang froid that his method of reckoning genealogy "does, in the most remarkable manner, bring Israelitish history into harmony with Egyptian history [etc., etc.,], and with the internal evidence of Israelitish history itself!" Comment is unnecessary.

Jamieson, commenting on Ruth lying at Boaz's feet, declares, "In ordinary circumstances these directions from Naomi would have seemed indecorous to the world, but in the case of Ruth, it was a method, doubtless [he don't pretend to know], conformable to present usage of reminding Boaz of the duty which devolved on him as the kinsman of her deceased husband." Then he proceeds to describe the position in which Boaz "probably slept," and that "there was no indelicacy in a stranger or even a woman putting the extremity of this cover [bed quilt] over her." So Ruth is all right in the estimation of Prof. Jamieson.

Not so Bathsheba. Though the queen, mother of King Solomon, she does not escape a severe castigation from some of the chaste commentators for indecently exposing her person on the house-top to the amorous king. Jamieson considers her a conspirator from the first, as she bargained with David that her son Solomon should sit upon the throne instead of the rightful heir.

He admits, however, "The arts and stratagems by which the king tried to cajole Uriah, till at last he resorted to the horrible crime of murder, the cold-blooded cruelty of despatching the letter by the hands of the gallant but much-wronged soldier himself, the enlistment of Joab to be a partaker of his sin, the heartless affectation of mourning, and the indecent haste of his marriage with Bathsheba, have left a stain upon the character of David, and exhibit a painfully humiliating proof of the awful lengths to which the best of men may go when they want the restraining grace of God." He confesses also to a blot on the names of Tamar and Rahab as well as Bathsheba.

From the elaborate storehouse of commentators upon the Virgin Mary there might be culled volumes, but that which has been quoted already must suffice.

Mr. Mair Criticised.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I notice that Mr. Mair, at the close of his reply to Mr. Bennett's fourteenth letter, says he is not afraid to leave it to the reader to decide for himself on which side the weakness and want of truth lies.

This suggested to me the idea of informing him of what I and many other readers of The Truth Seeker think of the discussion.

I hav read the whole controversy, and hav conversed with many Christians and Infidels who hav also read it, and all seem to see alike that Mr. Mair has not offered a single argument that is of any use except on the assumption that the God of the Bible does exist.

We all admit that if there is a God, and that if he is as good as a God should be, he is entitled to our respect. Even if he is the tyrant that the Bible unintentionally represents him to be, it might be policy to pet the redoubtable master. But be as he may, we want to know of his existence before we giv away our property and follow Miller on the mountain. Our fathers hav done it under our eyes, and we are aware that they hav regretted it ever since.

Here I heard some old men a few days ago tell about some of their acquaintances who gave away all they possessed forty or fifty years ago to follow Mr. Miller to heaven, and they are here yet, no nearer heaven than they were then, but a great deal poorer. One of them, living not far from here, became insane, and still livs with a troubled mind.

What we want is to know God before we bow to the thousand and one inventors and expounders of deity who claim the right of receiving pay and honor on behalf of the heavenly authorities. We cannot recognize them all as divinely authorized, as they themselvs would not allow it, and we are not justified, owing to the contest between them for the sole right to rule, to recognize any single one of them without good, substantial proof that he is the genuin God agent, and we think our action praiseworthy in the eyes of God himself, if he does exist.

No banker would hire a clerk that had previously cashed a draft for him carelessly without examining the paper, and I cannot believe that God likes to see us foolishly confident any more than wise men do. A man who gets vexed at a stranger for not trusting him is generally called a fool. On the same principle, I do not believe that God will punish me for refusing to respect him or his orders before I know him.

Any man who will worship God on an uncertainty through fear, I call him a born coward or a dupe of the cowardly practice of Christians to take advantage of the tender age and helplessness of their children to impregnate their minds with the whims that hav been in a similar way inflicted upon them.

I once sold goods on credit. When I called on my employer for instructions as to the delicate matter of finding out the customers' reliability, he said: "To an intelligent business man the best way is to be plain and right to the point, and he will hav a good opinion of you; but when you come to one of the ignorant kind of traders you must strive by some cunning way to acquire the knowledge unbeknown to him." I hope Mr. Mair will allow us at least to treat his God as one of the intelligent class.

Mr. Mair says that the divine person who appeared to Abraham, Jacob, and others was Christ. Don't you think the gentleman might hav found a better argument by taking a step or two on Spiritualistic ground, and materialize his divine spirit temporarily, than by telling us that Christ wrestled with Jacob a whole night about a thousand years before he was born?

If Christ existed, then it strikes me that he must hav been like the rest of the divine family—all soul and no body—unless he was born several times unknown to any one.

I notice that Mr. Mair shows no mercy to the poor Roman Catholics. I think if he could giv the matter impartial consideration, he would soon find that the Roman Catholics are the only real Christians. If Luther, Calvin, and the other reformers had the right to use their own judgment, and accordingly discard one of the Christian dogmas, why had they not the right to discard all that is contrary to human reason?

I was a Roman Catholic until I was twenty-seven years of age. When I discovered the rascality of the church I made up my mind that God could hav nothing to do with that institution, so I gave that up and picked up the Bible for a change, and in that I got disgusted at the outset. I could not see how an Almighty God could make man imperfect, and cry over his failure in a job he had pronounced good when he had completed it; and to this day I hav searched in vain for the explanation of that paradox, and I sincerely believe that if the Rev. Mr. Luther had stood like me in the matter of religion when he seceded from the Roman church, nothing to gain and nothing to lose, his fate would hav been like mine, and to-day such honest and intelligent men as Mr. Mair would not suffer with hereditary delirium tremens.

Chas. Laperche.

Alcoholic Drinks.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The remarks of Bro. Blatchford in your paper induce me to write briefly on the subject.

When the so-called temperance reform was commenced, like other reforms, I remember the greatest opposition which it encountered was from the church and church-members. But when they became satisfied that the cause would go forward in spite of them, the same as in other reforms, they turned around, triumphantly exclaiming, "See what we hav done." Though now nearly fifty-nine years old, and having never yet tasted alcoholic liquors of any kind, yet I cannot act with the temperance organizations of the day, for they are under the control of the church, which swills down wine "in commemoration of the death and sufferings of Jesus Christ," when everyone of ordinary common sense very well knows that if it be right to drink it on Sunday in the sanctuary it is right to drink it on Saturday in the saloon.

Nevertheless, 1. Alcohol is a stimulant; 2. To stimulate the healthy system, and thus increase its action, is to wear it out or break it down the sooner, and to that extent shorten life; 3. The use of one stimulant can be no justification for the use of another; 4. A useless injury to or unnecessary shortening of one's life cannot be justified.

Bro. Blatchford may, if he will, put these statements into his pipe and smoke them.

Respectfully yours, M. Farrington.

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER IX.

"I stepped," continued Abbé Dillon, "to the couch of the unfortunate philosopher, pressed with emotion his hard hand, and said, 'Thou art right, Alamontada. All that even the severest doubter can say about this grand object is, at the highest, I cannot comprehend it. It is impossible to giv a visible proof either against or for it. I feel it with thee, Alamontada, we are without wings for the supernatural world. But to attempt to deny God out of the eternal, endless, magnificent universe is the most eccentric arrogance of a dreamer, to whom was given more school-wit than mother-wit. The human mind, compelled through the laws of its being, must believe in a supreme being, although the mind cannot perceive it with its senses, cannot mathematically demonstrate it. Were God sensually visible, then he would be finite, would be dust, not God. This belief is so united and one with reason that to destroy it would mean to ruin reason. This all ages of the world felt. No teacher of nations and no people on earth ever spoke, I know God! but in all tongues it is, I believe in God!

"'And this belief,' continued Alamontada, 'is more than an ordinary taking a cause to be true for diverse reasons—yea, is far more than a knowledge at which we arrive by means of comparisons, conclusions, and external observations. It is a naturally needed obligation, one and the same existence with it, the unchangeable basis of all higher knowledge, without which no union and unriddling of all that which is known were possible. Just as every mortal is first brought, through observations and conclusions, to clearness of his own consciousness and convictions, that he really exists and livs; so he reaches only in observations and conclusions, a consciousness of the existence of God. But he has had life, before he could form conclusions, and the idea of God he possessed before it became clear to him through life and experience. We find it with the nations of all zones, and earlier with them than all other knowledge and art of life. It is nothing arbitrary, nothing invented, nothing traditional; it is—how shall I express it to you in our hard, unwieldly, poor, human speech?—it is the godlike, out of which we are. We are atoms of the divine being, I might say, which can never lose or deny their origin and their share in the eternal primitiv being. And this belief, inseparable from mankind, which is, in reality, no belief, but something more than that, for in it is founded, at the same time, the indestructible value of our spirit.'"

At these words, Roderick interrupted the abbé. "There ran a strange thought through Alamontada's speech," exclaimed he. "He spoke of the self-revelation of the supreme being in our reason. I confess that it would hav contributed much to the tranquilization of man, and would hav destroyed forever all doubts, if God in some way had revealed himself to man in this world, and not alone in reason. It is difficult for me to express this thought or wish right clearly. But I want to say about this much, that the kind of divine revelation of which Alamontada speaks is by far not so evident as many another would be."

Abbé Dillon smiled, laid his book down before him, and spoke: "For the part which we hav been created to act here below; on the point, upon which we stand in the linking of beings; with the instruments of knowledge with which we, as beings that are called men, hav been equipped, no other self-revelation of the divinity is possible than in the spirit. With my other senses, with eyes, ears, feeling, smell, and taste, I can only perceive the sensual. But the supernatural, spiritual, can only be touched by the supernatural spirit. What other revelation couldst thou thyself invent that would be elevated above all doubts? A direct embassador of the godhead to the human race, who would hav preached to us its existence and proved it by miracles? Almost every nation boasts to hav had these embassadors; they lived and taught a few years and doubts followed their embassy and their miracles. The Chinaman believes in Fhoi, the Hindoo in Brahma, the Jew in Moses, the Turk in his Prophet. But we, dear Roderick, doubt the heavenly mission of all. If to-day the dead should burst their vaults and preach revelation, would we believe them? We would see in this resurrection only something unusual. We would not look upon it as a proof of their divine mission and the truthfulness of their words, but as a proof of our hitherto ignorance about the course of nature. Every truth bears the power to convince in its own bosom, not in things outside of itself. If I were to attempt to prove to thee that the circle while it is round is at the same time square, and that two times two are seven, thou wouldst laugh. If I now, to prove the correctness of my words, would let the stream run up hill and the sun stagger about in the sky, so wouldst thou on that account not be convinced of the truth of those propositions, but say, These strange phenomena of nature are proof that we do not yet know the laws of nature and their powers.

"Would, therefore, God reveal himself to the human race, that is, communicate to it, God is! then it could not be done through influences upon the senses; it must be done through working upon the spirit. This working must last not only like that of a prophet, for a few years, but must endure forever; not only extend itself to a number of chosen believers, but over all humanity without exception. Friend, this revelation, this only possible, we hav. God's eternal magnificence shines through the being of our spirit because we are of divine origin; and with the consciousness of our earthly life the consciousness of an immortal life becomes clear. We know not whence comes the light within us, for it is not taken from the outer world, but it has arisen within us, from an unexplorable something, which is the basis of all that is. God is, because I am; I am, because God is. That is no guessing, no desire, no belief; no, it is an unchangeable being, and is because it is, and through the mere existence proves its being. It lies deeper than all forms of imagination and thinking, so deep as the consciousness of ourselvs within us. It is not in itself mere imagination, but state. For that reason are the measures of possibility and probability inapplicable. There is a God! Does not this grand revealed word speak through the oldest document of humanity, and through the youngest nation of the world, which has no knowledge of it?"

Dillon's speech moved me also with strange power. In Roderick's eye sparkled the dew of a tear. We spread out our arms, embraced the aged man, kissed his cheeks, and cried, "There is a God!"

A light evening breeze floated over the flowers in the garden through the open window, cooling our glowing temples. The moon enveloped the earth in her magic light, and millions of suns sparkled in star-constellations in the heavens.

What are the rich or the poor? And how do "the simple annals of the poor" differ from the complex annals of the rich, were they never so rich? What is thy attainment compared with an Alexander's, a Mohammed's, a Napoleon's? And what was theirs? A temporary fraction of this planetkin, the whole round of which is but a sand-grain in the all, its whole duration but a moment in eternity. The poorer life or the rich one are but the larger or smaller (very little smaller) letters in which are written the apothegms and golden sayings of life. It may be a false saying or a true one. There lies it all. This is of quite infinit moment; the rest is, verily and indeed, of next to none.—Carlyle's "Reminiscences."

Discussion.

Our Eighteenth Letter to Mr. Mair.

STILL MORE OF GOD AND THE GOD BOOKS.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I hardly expected you would be able to adduce any new arguments to prove the existence of a God, but I hoped you had something better than the threadbare, fallacious, and unsatisfactory argument of Paley. I wished you to tell me what you yourself know about God, and what tangible proof you have to offer that any such being exists. I insisted that he is something or nothing. If he exists he is something, an entity, and you or somebody else ought to be able to find some of this universal substance, test it, demonstrate it, and prove it to others who cannot find it. This you and all others fail to do. Your universal, "everywhere-present," "infinite" God cannot be caught. You cannot find him, you cannot produce any part of him. I requested of you that if God is an entity, a real existence, to produce at least a little of it; but you only trot out Paley and his inconclusive, defective theological argument.

Need I dwell upon the absurdity of any scientist, any chemist, claiming the existence of any element, any principl e, any quality, any form of substance, whether vapor, gas, ether, or whatever it may be, without being able to produce any or it or demonstrating that it really exists? What you and all theologians are attempting to do in maintaining the existence of God is just this, precisely. You are claiming the existence of that which you cannot produce and which you cannot demonstrate.

If God is not an entity, not substance, not something that can be found or produced, then he is nothing and has no existence.

You array the universe with its order and beauty to prove the existence of your God. I cannot accept this as any proof at all, but pronounce it a most utter absurdity. This fallacious argument proves the existence of Jove, Odin, Allah, Osiris, Baal, Ashur, Chemosh, Moldach, Om, Indra, Brahma, Fohi, Ahura, Ormuzd, Mumbo Jumbo, or those thousand other gods just as much as Yahweh of the Jews.

I am not behind yourself in my admiration of the universe. I behold its mysteries, its wonders, its grandeur, its power, its beauty, with a feeling of adoration and awe. To me it is the supreme power, the sum of all life, all existence, all possibilities. It contains all that exists. It is my God. I am too far overwhelmed with its magnificence, its continuity, its endlessness, its indestructiblity, its eternality, with its countless systems, suns, and worlds, to for one moment believe that it was all, six thousand years ago, created from nothing by a fickle, irrascible, puerile, tutelary God imagined three or four thousand years ago or more among the hills of Palestine. I think far too much of the grand, ever-extending, everlasting universe to think that it was ever created, ever devised, ever designed by any god, whether Brahma, Ormuzd, Osiris, Baal, Zeus, Jupiter, Odin, Yahweh, or Mumbo Jumbo. There is just as much proof that either of these gods exist, or that all of them exist, as that any one exists; and there is just as much proof that any one of them created the universe as that any of them did, or that any other god did.

Your claim that God must exist because all nations and races have believed in some kind of a god amounts to very little. In the first place it is not true; there have been, are still, races who have believed in no sort of a god. But waiving all that, it amounts to nothing, or proves too much, which is about the same thing. All races and tribes of men, so far as we are informed, have believed more or less in devils, devas, demons, genii, gnomes, gorgons, satyrs, fairies, sprites, naiads, nymphs, elves, witches, and an almost endless number of similar absurdities, which never had an existence. The firm belief in these conceptions on the part of millions has not been sufficient to cause one of them to have a real existence. The belief of a million times as many beings as ever inhabited this globe is not sufficient to bring into existence one single fairy, one single genius, or one single god. These are all monstrosities, conjured up by ignorant minds, and never had a real existence. As men become enlightened by the truths of science and reason, the genii, the satyrs, the hobgoblins, the fairies, the elves, the demons, and the devils are abandoned and pass out of existence. It is the same with the gods, they are fast receding, falling back, fading away, growing thinner and thinner, one after the other dropping out of existence, and in due time it is to be hoped that not an elf, not a devil, and not a god will be left to torment poor, weak, superstitious human beings; when men will be more able to study the laws of the universe, investigate the truths of science, and learn the superiority of the true and the real above the false and the unreal, the imaginary.

I deny that there is inherent in the mind of man a conviction or conception of a god. These conceptions have all grown out of what have been told us. All we know of any god, or all that we think we know, is what others have told us. The gods and devils all come from the false teachings given us by others. In proof of this let me cite the reports of principals of deaf and dumb asylums. Mr. Wild, a deaf mute, principal of the McKay Institute for Deaf and Dumb, Montreal, Can., published a pamphlet on the subject. The London (Ont.) Advertiser of Sept. 24, 1880, in examining this pamphlet used these words: "The intellectual condition of the uneducated deaf and dumb is described as being little above that of the more intelligent of the brute creation, and lower than that of the most enlightened savages. Neither their own reflections nor the imperfect attempts of their friends to teach them have given them any idea of right and wrong, of the soul and its future existence, nor of the creator. This is a hard saying for those who believe in a 'primitive conscience.' But as the outcome of the experience and observation of one who is himself a deaf mute it is worthy of note, certainly, if this be true. No stronger inducement could be offered to the parents and friends of the deaf and dumb to give them the benefit of an education, which, so much more than develops, seems to actually create a mind and conscience."

Yes, that is the very idea, as this Scottish, Calvinistic sheet confesses. Education is what does it. Yes,

> "'Tis education forms the common mind;
> Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

What we are educated to believe in our childhood we readily accept, and often carry such beliefs to the grave. If taught to believe Buddhism we are Buddhists; if Mohammedanism, the Moslem faith is true to us; if Mormonism, we regard Joe Smith as a true prophet; if we are educated that the Christian religion is true, we readily accept it, and are often ready to lay down our lives in fighting for its extended rule. If we are taught to believe in fairies, we readily accept them; if we are told of witches, our belief easily admits of their existence; if we are taught that the devil exists and is our greatest foe, then it is very easy for us to believe in his satanic majesty, horns, hoofs, tail, and all; if we are educated that three gods are one god, we believe it as easily as all the rest, and, to our inexperienced minds, the god or gods become a reality, and we can accept Jove, Brahma, Fohi, Odin, Yahweh, or Mumbo Jumbo, as easy as our breath. All that any of us know of any fairies, genii, elves, witches, demons, devils, or gods is what we are told. These being instilled into us with our mothers' milk, during all the days of our childhood and youth we accept them as truths, and as we grow up to be men and women we regard it as an immorality to disbelieve in such personages, and feel that men ought to be put to death for being unable to believe in them.

It is true that when we find anything that bears the proof of having been constructed, we naturally think somebody must have made it. When Paley found his watch he very properly thought it had been constructed and put together by a skillful mechanic. But it is very absurd to judge of the world or the universe of thousands and millions of worlds by a watch. When we find a world we have no reason to think it was put together as a man forms a watch. Paley did not think his watchmaker made his watch from nothing, but simply that he formed its wheels and all its parts of metals already in existence, and put them together, but with the world he pretends to believe that its maker created it from nothing at all. In this he was in error. It is impossible to hold a rational belief that something can me made of nothing. In the words of Ingersoll, "Nothing, considered in the light of a raw material, is a most decided failure." If the material of which the world was made had a previous and eternal existence then it was not a creation but simply a transformation. If it is admitted, then, that matter always existed, it must also be admitted that force, which is always inherent in it, always existed, together with the laws controlling them. When this sensible point is reached there is no use for a creator, there is nothing for a superintendent or designer to do.

So long as it is found that not one atom of matter can be produced from nothing, and that not one atom can be converted into nothing, the crude idea that the entire solar system and the thousands of suns and worlds were made by an imaginary being from nothing is most absurd. When it is not in the power of a million of gods and devils combined to make one grain of matter from nothing, how supremely ridiculous to set up a theory that one poor, despicable Jew-god, some six thousand years ago, made thousands of systems, suns, and worlds of nothing! It is far more consistent to accept the existence of the universe as an eternal reality than imagine that an impalpable, impersonal, inconceivable being invented and created it all from nothing at all. It is far easier for me to regard the universe as eternal than to imagine it was ever made.

The argument of design and harmony in the universe is all you have to depend upon in defense of your belief of a God. You have nothing else to clutch, nothing else to adduce as proof. I regard your proof as very defective, very insufficient, and very unjust. It is wrong to steal from the universe, so to speak, its harmony, adaptation, and grandeur, and with them build up an unknowable, inconceivable being without any other proofs of his existence. To me it seems absolutely dishonest. The universe is too grand, too magnificent, too boundless, too infinite, too eternal to be treated in such a shabby manner.

I have in a previous letter said something on the design argument, but despite the fear of repetition I must again notice your false claims in this direction. You hold that the harmony, adaptation, and design in the universe are proofs of a God. To me the claim is erroneous; they simply prove the perfection and grandeur of the universe. For you they prove too much. In logic that which proves too much proves nothing. If harmony, adaptation, and apparent design in the universe require a creator so must the same qualities always require a creator wherever they may exist. If a being created the universe and imparted to it harmony, adaptation, and design he possessed those qualities in still larger degree, for as no stream can rise above its fountain, so no being can create anything superior to himself; so God could not impart to the universe any more harmony, adaptation, and design than he possessed himself, and probably not so much. If, then, the existence of harmony, adaptation, and design in the universe proves that it was created from nothing, the same qualities in God prove that he was created. from nothing. You cannot get away from this. If harmony, adaptation, and design had to be created for the universe they had to be created for God. If you insist that the universe was created, to be at all logical, you must insist that its creator was created, and you may keep on imagining the creator of creators until your head swims and you have to sit down to steady your trembling nerves.

Let me assure you that design belongs to a finite being and not to the infinite. Design implies the use of means to reach an end. Man designs, plans, contrives, fits, and changes to produce results as he finds need. Design implies the necessity of change, modification of purpose to meet rising wants. It implies finiteness and a limit of power. An infinite being of infinite power might be supposed to speak everything into existence by the mere fiat of his will, without design, without contriving, without slow evolution, without cause and effect. It is absurd to speak of design and contrivance on the part of infinite power. It is finite beings who have to design, contrive, fit, and try, not the infinite. "An infinite being would not have to employ means to complete his works; he would not have to doubt and cogitate before he accomplished his design; that would be the method of man. It is absurd to suppose that a God did all those things."

If you say that your imaginary God, possessing harmony, adaptation, and design, is eternal and was never created, it is just as easy, and far more sensible, to admit that the universe is eternal and was never created. The universe has a real existence that every intelligent person can be made sensible of, and by no possibility can a grain of new matter be added to it, nor can a grain of it be destroyed, while the existence of God cannot be proved at all, being wholly a creature of human imagination. It is far more truthful to say that the human portion of the universe created God from nothing than that this created God or any other myth created the universe out of nothing.

It is no more wonderful that harmony, order, and law should exist in the universe than that the universe itself or any part of it should exist. Existence is a mystery beyond our powers to solve; but the most childish of all modes ofs olution is to imagine that a being made it all from nothing. It is like the ideas of the ancient Hindoos when they thought everything that has existence must have something to rest upon; and so of the world, which they supposed to be the chief part of the universe, and was a permanent, immovable straight stretch of land and country. They held that the earth rested upon an elephant, and the elephant rested on a huge tortoise, but what the tortoise rested upon they were never quite able to determine, though one more inventive than the rest said it was tortoise "all the way down." So it is with theologians and yourself about the creation or the origin of the universe. You say, "Why, God made it." When I ask where God came from, you might, with equal propriety, say, "Another God made him." And when I ask where that God came from, you might say, like the Hindoos, that you could not tell how that second God came, or, as with the tortoise, it was "God all the way back." The soundness of the logic in one case would be about equal with the other. You and the theologians know just as little about the gods and the origin of the universe as the old Hindoos knew about what supports the earth—all guess-work.

As grand as the universe and all nature is, many of its phenomena are of such a terrible character as to preclude the belief that it was designed and is directed by a beneficent being possessing omniscience and omnipotence. It could not be a benevolent designer who gets up earthquakes to destroy cities and villages, volcanoes to pour forth rivers of lava and submerge the habitations of men with the fiery flood; storms, hurricanes, cyclones, simoons, and tornadoes to destroy human life and devastate portions of the earth's surface; lightnings to strike to the earth animals and men and destroy human habitations. It is not a very beneficent designer that sends floods, famines, locusts, grasshoppers, cutworms, army worms, weevils, potato bugs, and the thousand and one enemies of vegetation which prey upon the fruits of man's toil and destroy the products of the earth. It was not a good, first-class designer who got up such wild and ravenous beasts of prey as lions, tigers, wolves, bears, panthers, hyenas, with anacondas, boas, rattlesnakes, cobras, moccasins, adders, vipers, scorpions, tarantulas, spiders, crocodiles, alligators, sharks, and the thousand and one kinds of pestiferous stinging, biting, poisonous insects, flies, fleas, bugs, and worms, which seem to serve no purpose but to annoy and torment men and animals. It was hardly a good, merciful, and heavenly-minded designer who devised all the maladies and ills that afflict and decimate mankind, to wit, smallpox, the measles, cholera, flux, dysentery, diarrhœa, black vomit, yellow fever, camp fever, typhus fever, scarlet fever, all other fevers, congestions, epilepsy, apoplexy, paralysis, rheumatism, gout, neuralgia, neurosis, tumors, cancers, salt rheum, strangury, diabetes, Bright's disease, the stone, colics, cramps, spasms, convulsions, diphtheria, scarlatina, mumps, bronchitis, catarrh, consumption, dyspepsia, marasmus, spinal diseases, nervous diseases, and the almost endless maladies, ills, and afflictions, epidemics and contagions, which have made poor men and women so unhappy, so full of pain and suffering, for thousands of years, and have caused millions of billions of mortals to linger in suffering for days, weeks, months, and years, and die most excrutiating deaths. An immensely better design it would have been for no diseases to have afflicted mankind; no pain and suffering to have tormented them, no fevers to have burnt them, no delirium to have maddened them, for health to be catching instead of disease, for human life to have been healthy and happy, so that, man, aged, tired, and weary of a long life, might peacefully lie down and die like a babe going to sleep.

Do you tell me that it was a good, merciful designer who devised and got up all these numberless terrible ills and afflictions, who devised malarias, miasmas, subtle and deadly poisons, mineral, vegetable, animal, fluid, gaseous, and aerial, all to afflict, torment, agonize, and kill his own creatures for whom he designed all and created all? I cannot accept it. I can see no marks of a good designer in the countless ills I find in the world. The existence of all these ills, all these woes, all the sources of suffering, are totally destructive to the belief in the existence of a merciful, indulgent designer. It is far easier for me to relegate all these to the domain of nature and her infallible laws of cause and effect. We see in all animated nature that one class of animals feed upon another. It is so with the beasts of the forests, the birds of the air, the reptiles of the earth, and the fishes of the sea. As the big fishes eat the little ones, so the stronger animals eat the weaker ones. If this is all by design, it is certainly more cruel than beneficent. I accept the views of Ingersoll when he says: "Nature, so far as we can discern, without passion and without intention, forms, transforms, and retransforms forever. She neither weeps nor rejoices. She produces man without purpose and obliterates him without regret. She knows no distinction between the beneficial and the hurtful. Poison and nutrition, pain and joy, life and death, smiles and tears, are alike to her. She is neither merciful nor cruel. She cannot be flattered by worship nor melted by tears. She does not even know the attitude of prayer. She appreciates no difference in the poison in the fangs of snakes and mercy in the hearts of men. Only through man does nature take cognizance of the good, the true, and the beautiful, and, so far as we know, man is the highest intelligence."

I recognize in nature the cause of all existence, the cause of all the events that have taken place, all that are now taking place, all that ever can take place, and this without any purpose or design. No result has ever been produced, has ever existed, without a good, sufficient natural cause to produce it. There are none but natural causes. Supernatural causes, and supernaturalism in all its phases, are only the dreams of ignorant minds, who have devised all the demons, the devils, and the gods that have been a curse to humanity. With the same natural ease and facility with which twice two are four, with which a whole is equal to two halves, with which the shortest distance between two points is a straight line, all the evolutions, problems, and results of nature are produced. All we have to do is to study her laws, learn to understand their certainty and unchangeableness, to learn what is harmful to us and avoid it or prevent it, to learn what is beneficial to us and how best to appropriate it and make it conducive to our welfare and happiness. If we do this intelligently and judiciously it will be immensely better than depending on mythical gods and devils, which only exist in the brains of ignorance and superstition.

Nature is full of life. Naturalists and scientists tell us that millions of species of organized animals and insects have existed and passed away. They were not fitted to the struggle of existence and were forced to yield the contest. It is only the fittest which survive. The animals most able to contend with their enemies and the evils which environ them are those which maintain their existence; the others have to succumb to rise no more. It is the animals with fine fur, warm wool, etc., who are able to withstand the frigidity of the northern latitudes; all others have to perish. The great law of cause and effect governs all without the slightest attention to the plans and designs of any imaginary being.

There is even an excellent reason why the bears of the polar regions are white. Being of the color of the snow and ice which everywhere abound, they easily escape the detection of hunters and enemies of all kinds, while those of other colors are easily seen and killed, and here again it is seen the law of "the survival of the fittest" clearly rules. An infinite number of forms of animal life have become extinct because they were not fitted to the conditions around them. The mammoth, the woolly elephant, the megatherium, are large animals of this class, the bones of which have been found in many parts of the world, but which species no longer exist. It is the same with an immense number of smaller forms of animated life. They have ceased to live because no longer fitted to the conditions around them. Design had nothing to do with it.

True, the organization of the nervous system, of the eye, and of the birds of the air is all curious, but not necessarily the result of design. Nature possesses immense resources and is amply able to produce every form of life that has ever existed; and everything has been in harmony with the law of evolution which pervades the universe. It is highly probable that all the present forms of life upon the earth have evolved through countless ages from lower or germinal forms of life. The brain and the eye as now found in animals and men are far in advance of the crude and imperfect ones which once existed. The eye is believed to be a modification of animal nerve, produced by the action of light, electricity, and the subtle forces of nature It is only the animals that live in the light that have eyes, worms, moles, etc., which live in the earth and fishes in caves where light never enters, have no eyes or if they have germinal eyes they perform no function. Light undoubtedly perfects the eye and imparts to it the power of vision. It is much the same with birds which people the air. They gradually become adapted to the conditions around them and it is only such as so become adapted that can exist in the air upon the wing. Animated nature possesses the capacity to adapt itself to the conditions in which it exists, and independent of design, and when this adaptation cannot take place, species become extinct. It is always the fittest which survive.

I will not contend with you as to the hair-splitting question of which was first, life or organization, though I think you are mistaken in thinking Huxley and other scientists hold that life exists before organization, and that life gives organization. The two are undoubtedly so closely allied that there could have been but very slight difference as to the period of their origin. Where organization is, is life, and vice versa. One can scarcely exist without the other. It is possible some scientists may favor the theory that life precedes organization, but you fail to show when they assert it. I am very sure that Haeckel, than whom a more learned scientist does not live, holds that life and organization evolve together and are inseparably united. I think also that Huxley does the same, and ask you to show where he asserts to the contrary, or states that there is life without organization. As long as organization is essential to life, it is absurd to think life exists independent of it. The jelly fish has a very low order of life, and the organization is of the same character. Its organization is equal to its life.

HOLY BOOKS.

You occupied a large share of your letter by showing that in the sacred writings of the Hindoos are many silly and absurd things. It was unnecessary for you to do this. I would readily have granted it and saved you all that trouble. And to save you further trouble in the same direction, I now admit that all the pretended books called the "word of God" which have come down to our time contain much that is childish, silly, and untrue. The sacred writings of the Hindoos are probably more than ten times as voluminous as those of the Jews and Christians, and it would be indeed singular if some of their theological and metaphysical notions, written nearly three thousand years ago, were not more or less absurd, according to our advanced ideas. I trust you will remember that I have not set myself up as an advocate of the beauty, sense, or truthfulness of the Hindoo sacred writings, or of the sacred writings of any other nation. I have no more reverence for the bible of one nation than for another. The bibles of the Hindoos and Persians are probably not much better than the bible of the Jews and vice versa. They are all absurd enough in all conscience. If the Hindoo scriptures had been revised, remodeled, worked over, and re-retranslated and improved as many times as the Jewish and Christian scriptures have been, probably some of the silliness and absurdity might have been expurgated from them.

But as childish as are the quotations which you give from the Khandas, I am pleased to see in them none of the immorality and indecency so characteristic of the Jewish scriptures. Though you may class them as silly, you cannot show them to be immoral or obscene, as I can easily show the Jewish and Christian Bibles to be. In this delectable volume, which you so greatly revere, lying, stealing, robbery, assassination, massacre, slaughter, war, carnage, and bloodshed are advocated and approved, and also in it are hundreds of positive contradictions, hundreds of out-and-out falsehoods, and hundreds of filthy and indecent statements and allusions not excelled in any publications save those abominable ones condemned by the moral and clean-minded people of all communities.

When you take into consideration the narrations of useless and cruel slaughters, battles, and wars of which the Bible is largely composed, its tales of wrong and injustice, its records of men going in unto their wives, of the wives conceiving and bringing forth their young, of intrigues, adulteries, whoredoms, rapes, incests, and the entire list of repulsive stuff which the Jewish book contains, it sinks far below the moral level of the scriptures of the Hindoos or any other nation under the sun. When it is so easy for you to detect faults, absurdities, and silliness in the scriptures of other nations it is indeed singular how you can retain such a reverence for the worse than inanities, the falsehoods, the immorality, the indecencies of the Jewish and Christian scriptures. This is to be accounted for only on the basis that you were reared under the teaching that every word in the Jewish scriptures was written by God, while all the pagan scriptures are the work of the devil. Here again we see the effects of education on the human mind.

I will just take the space here to say that you err in saying that the Jewish scriptures were written before the sacred writings of the Hindoos. There is not the slightest proof that the Pentateuch was written by Moses, nor less than some eight hundred years after his time. With the exception of two or three of the older prophets, there is not a shadow of proof that any of the books of the Old Testament were written more than five or six hundred years before our era. That Moses was the author of the first five books in the Bible is one of the many frauds and falsehoods with which the Christian system is so replete. But more of this in future letters.

You must surely remember that in the quotations I commenced giving, my purpose was not to show which set of scriptures claiming to be the word of some god were the most sensible or the most true, but to show that teachers and philosophers older than Jesus enunciated moral sentiments and maxims fully equal to those taught by the Galilean reformer. I shall, of course, when done, willingly submit it to our readers whether I have accomplished this or not. I will now introduce a few passages from the great Persian reformer, Zoroaster, variously believed to have lived from three to five thousand years ago:

Worship with humility and reverence Ormuzd, the giver of blessings, and all spirits to whose care he has intrusted the universe. Men ought reverently to salute the sun, and praise him, but not pay religious worship.

Obey strictly all the laws written in the Zend Avesta.

Kings are animated by more ethereal fire than other mortals, such fire as exists in the upper spheres. Ormuzd established the king to nourish and solace the poor. He is to his people what Ormuzd is to this earth. It is the duty of subjects to obey him implicitly.

It is the duty of children to obey their parents; of wives to obey their husbands.

Treat old age with great reverence and tenderness.

Multiply the human species and increase its happiness.

Cultivate the soil, drain the marshes, and destroy dangerous creatures.

He who sows the ground with diligence acquires a greater stock of religious merit than he could gain by ten thousand prayers in idleness.

Multiply domestic animals, nourish them, and treat them gently.

Warriors who defend the right deserve praise.

Do not allow thyself to be carried away by anger. Angry words and scornful looks are sins. To strike a man or vex him with words is sin. Even the intention to strike another merits punishment. Opposition to peace is a sin. Reply to thine enemy with gentleness.

Avoid everything calculated to injure others. Have no companionship with a man who injures his neighbors.

Take not that which belongs to another.

Be not envious, avaricious, proud, or vain. Energy and jealousy are the work of evil spirits. Haughty thoughts and thirst of gold are sins.

To refuse hospitality and not to succor the poor are sins.

Obstinacy in maintaining a lie is a sin. Be very scrupulous to observe the truth in all things.

Abstain from thy neighbor's wife. Fornication and immodest looks are sins.

Avoid licentiousness, because it is one of the readiest means to give evil spirits power over body and soul.

Strive, therefore, to keep pure in body and mind, and thus prevent the entrance of evil spirits, who are always trying to gain possession of man. To think evil is a sin.

Contend constantly against evil, morally and physically, internally and externally. Strive in every way to diminish the power of Ahriman and destroy his works. If a man has done this he may fearlessly meet death, well assured that radiant Izads will lead him across the luminous bridge into a paradise of eternal happiness.

Having reached the limit assigned to this letter further quotations will be deferred till my next.

Yours truly, D. M. B.

California Letter and Notes from the Lecture Field.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav just received your circular intimating that you are ready to depart as soon as the promised means are at hand, and I am only too glad to contribute to an enterprise which I think will be fraught with much good to the cause for which I am laboring night and day.

You will find inclosed money order for $9.50, five of which is for your trip round the world and the balance for The Truth Seeker, to be sent as directed in my private letter.

Since my last letter I hav been hard at work on my southern California trip, which was concluded on last Sunday night at Modesto, making three full months of steady fire almost nightly into the ranks of bigotry and superstition.

My lectures hav been largely attended for the most part, notwithstanding they hav elicited the most bitter opposition from the Jesus worshipers all along the line. The galled jades wince as if liquid fire were turned upon their naked heads. They seem to forget that the tables are turned and that light and truth hav come to burn up the dross of time-honored superstition which has held the people so long in bondage.

My first appointment found me on time at Lompoc Colony in Santa Barbara county. My advent there was a surprise gotten up for the benefit of the church by a few friends of human progress who had suffered patiently and long the iron rule of the Christian church, for a more precious lot of fanatics I hav never met. This is a temperance colony, and Christian bigotry and intolerance of the most bitter kind hav cropped out here in the cause of temperance. Preachers and people of the Christian persuasian hav conspired to blow up buildings with bombshells at the risk of human life for Christ's sake. I gave eight lectures at Lompoc to large and attentiv audiences, and left them with a promis to do so more. My thanks are due to George Roberts and wife, formerly of San Jose, Mr. Tucker, and others, for a helping hand.

Following closely the line of the ocean to the south, up hill and down dale, passing through canyons deep and dark and again emerging into the sunlight in full view of the grand old sea, here, sixty miles from Lompoc, sits Santa Barbara, perched like a gem of 'beauty 'mid the vine-clad hills, with a narrow stretch of valley land extending some miles up and down the coast as fertil as the Eden of story, the bright blue sea in the foreground, and flanked in the near background by an abrupt mountain range —here by the sea lies Santa Barbara, one of the great sanitary points of the Pacific coast, great in beauty and greater in expectations of a railroad to connect her with the interior life of the state.

The citizens of Santa Barbara are a bright, activ people with whom I lectured and labored a whole month, including six lectures given at Galeta and Carpenteria on week-day evenings. I met my old friend and fellow-worker Warren Chase and family who are about to start for the East for a visit to his former field of labor. Although a multitude of years hav left their traces on his brow, his mind is still clear and his tongue trenchant as a Damascus blade in defense of his conviction of right and truth. Many thanks are due to Messrs. Walcott, Moris, and Hunts, with many others who strengthened my heart and hands while I preached the gospel of nature.

From thence by stage still south along the ocean beach to Ventura, lying at the mouth of Santa Clara valley, a broad and beautiful valley rich in grain and fruits.

I gave five lectures here with the usual good success My thanks are due to Mrs. Stevens and family, as also to Mr. Corey, and especially to Dr. A. Bronson, of Nordhoff, who came fifteen miles to hear me speak and was somehow inspired with the idea that the laborer is worthy of his hire, that is, he acted from some such noble motiv, as when we parted he grasped my hand and left within it a twenty-dollar piece, bidding me godspeed in my work. May the good angels and the honey-bees (in the former he has but little faith, and of the latter is a large owner) see to it that he is blessed in basket and store.

My next appointment brought me to Santa Paula, a little village in a rich agricultural district, strongly resembling my own Santa Clara valley, of Santa Clara county. The product here is grain, honey, and fruits of all kinds common to California, and especially does the orange thrive well here—better, if possible, than at Los Angeles, being better protected from the sea winds. A more lovely sight will hardly greet the eye of the traveler than an orange orchard at Santa Paula of one hundred acres, just coming into bearing, in rows both ways as straight as an arrow, and kept as clean as a good housewife's parlor—fortune enough for any reasonable man, even at the low price of one dollar per hundred.

I gave four red-hot lectures at this place to counteract, if possible, the effects of a religious revival which had just closed. You can imagin how the preachers gnashed on me with their teeth. But I told them that wherever rattlesnakes are plenty nature has provided an antidote close at hand. Of course, they and I don't agree. They call me the devil. But having been once afflicted with that peculiar disease known among thinkers as religion for the term of twenty-three years, I am prepared and inclined to be charitable to those differing from me on the subject of religion.

Leaving the many friends all glad, and the preachers all mad, I moved on down the coast line to Newhall, a point on the S. P. road, a few miles above Los Angeles, where we turned our face homeward by the way of the San Joaquin, the largest valley in this state—in fact, large enough for a respectable sized state of itself; as far as the eye can see, fields of wheat, without fence, stretch out in the distance. The soil is light, but where irrigation has been effected the yield is bountiful.

My first point of labor was Bakersfield, in Kern county. I lectured two nights, just long enough to find out that a fast horse, a fast woman, and a jug of rum were matters of far greater interest than lectures upon Freethought and natural science; and if ever a town was cursed with intemperance and prostitution, this is that Hell's Half Acre—the plague spot of California.

From thence, four hours' ride by rail brought me to Visalia, the county seat of Tulare county, a beautiful town, surrounded by great oaks, which, like monarchs, lift up their heads so prominent in the distance, and so grateful in their shade to the dusty and worn traveler. This is a lively town of about two thousand inhabitants, in a well-watered district, the water being taken from a river, fed by melting snow, which covers the mountain side with dazzling whiteness close at hand.

This water is conveyed by ditches throughout a large tract of country, formerly a desert of sand, but now teeming with richness like a garden of beauty.

Twenty miles from Visalia, in the midst of this well-watered district, is the village of Hanford, a new town bristling with business activities, and the seat of the railroad war, known as the Mussle Slough district, of which you hav heard so much. But whatever equities there may be in favor of the settlers, their case is an utterly hopeless one, and eviction from these lands stares them in the face; and were it not for some brainless demagogs in their midst stimulating the people to unwise action, they might hav long since bought their lands and had them paid for at far less rates than claimed for them at present by the railroad company.

I spoke three times at Visalia, five times at Hanford, four times at Lamore, another beautiful village in this district, and three times at Grangeville, a little burg in the richest portion of the Mussle Slough country, where twenty acres of land is farm enough for one man if put out to nuts, apricots, and raisin grapes.

This country is rich in everything but mind. Southern Methodism and Tennessee Presbyterianism, both of which are a stench in the nostrils of a sensible man's God, abound here; so much so that while speaking at Grangeville, about thirty persons remained outside of the hall and threw clods and stones against the building during the whole lecture, which was extended a brief space for the benefit of these kind Christians for their courtesy to a stranger. But, like Ingersoll in handling Kalloch of San Francisco, I did not exhaust my vocabulary of mean words, but I thought that perhaps several generations of such a stock would need to be ploughed under and a new lot sprouted before better mental and moral results are possible.

My thanks are due to Judge Atwell, an eminent lawyer at Visalia, who stood by me in my effort to break the bread of common sense; and also to Dr. More, Morse, and Hamlin, of Lamore, for their kindness, and at Hanford to Mr. and Mrs. Babcock, and our friend Ford and family, who contributed largely with music and song to the success of our meetings at Hanford. God bless these kind friends. I hope I will not soon forget them for their kindness.

Five hours' ride by Southern Pacific railroad landed me safe and sound at Modesto, having passed through Fresno City and Merced City, not having time to stop this trip.

Modesto is a fine town of about two thousand inhabitants and is the county seat of Stanislaus county. They hav a Liberal League here composed of hearty workers for truth who are battling hard against the dry rot of religion which infests the town. Their work would be easy were it not for the moral cowardice lurking in the hearts of so-called Liberals.

I lectured here four nights to good audiences. This is the home of J. R. Kelso, an able thinker and eloquent speaker whose name I see in The Truth Seeker as about leaving California for a lecture tour in the East. I hope the friends on the route will giv him a helping hand.

My thanks are due at Modesto to C. C. Luther, Dr. Gilmore, Mr. and Mrs. Gates, Mrs. Lapham, and others. I think you hav a warm friend in Mr. Luther, who seems thoroughly interested in The Truth Seeker and its editor.

Parting with these kind friends, a short ride brought me home to the garden city, San Jose, concluding another trip of three months' hard work rubbing against the prejudices of a popular humbug and false religion. After I rest and catch my breath, my next trip will take me to Oregon and eastern Washington territory.

Friend Bennett, I can only hope for you all the success you so richly deserve for your fearless devotion to human liberty; and that angels and men may conspire to help you over all the rough places in your journey round the world and bring you back safe to home and friends is the desire of your fellow-worker,

Dr. J. L. York.

The Spiritual "What Is It?"

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: When Catholics abandoned their religion and joined the Protestants, their quondam friends called them heretics, knaves, fools, hypocrits, etc. To be a heretic meant all that is included in the other opprobrious terms. When many Protestants became Spiritualists, their former brethren, including the beloved pastor, denounced them in the most bitter manner. The boast of Spiritualists is that Materialists become Spiritualists, but no Spiritualist is converted to Materialism. Finding themselvs mistaken in this assertion, they piece out their argument by boldly impugning the purity of the dissentient's motivs. Whenever they are driven to this wretched relic of the battle-fields of zealots, it is more manly to confess themselvs beaten in the fair, open field of logic.

Mr. George Lynn, in his controversy with Messrs. Bedell and Pringle, givs me the choice of agreeing with him and receiving his blessing, or differing under the pains and penalties of forfeiting his good opinion. He may graciously admit that I am honest. Much as I may desire to retain his good will, loyalty to my own conviction may compel me to make the fearful sacrifice of getting on in the world without it. We hav read a book written by an eminent Christian, full of recipes, "Easy Method with Deists." The Spiritualists' plan is still less laborious. It is a shorthand method of meeting Materialists. Rule 1. If you hav never investigated Spiritualism, you are ignorant of the subject; 2. If you hav investigated without accepting it, you are unreasonably and skeptically stubborn; 3. Lastly, if you hav investigated, fully believed, and then become a Materialist, you are not honest.

This heavenly plan uses up the Materialists. There is nothing like it, except it may be the amuletic argument. The amulet protects every good Catholic who wears it. A Catholic is drowned in spite of his amulet. Ergo, he was not a good Catholic.

Listen to Lynn: "He tells us that he stands with Prof. Jamieson, who believes Spiritualism to be one of the greatest humbugs of the age—that will disappear as soon as its 'true inwardness' is found out.

"One of two things is true: either Prof. Jamieson said so or he did not. If he did, it stamps him as one of the most dishonest men of the age."

Mr. Lynn writes as if there could be but one meaning to a word, whereas there is scarcely one that has not several meaningss. The word "humbug," which I rarely employ, has several meanings. The root signification is "to deceive; to impose upon;" a "frightful object." I hav never said that Spiritualism is a frightful object. Probably the gentleman who used the word did not employ it in that sense. If I made use of the term, it would be in the sense of "an imposition under fair pretenses." The mistake which Spiritualists hav fallen into is in assuming that all imposition is wilful, voluntary. This is not the case. Some of the worst instances of imposition hav been self-imposition. No class, I think, are more subject to self-deception than so-called mediums. Thousands of them become so morbid that every passing whim or occurrence is a suggestion, impression, or manifestation from the spirit world. And now if such a person becomes skeptical about his own impressions, and finally concludes that they were not caused by spirits, he must be dishonest. My observations hav satisfied me that the most skeptical people among Spiritualists are "mediums" themselvs, and many of them freely express their doubts about their own "controls." Every Spiritualist of much experience knows this to be a fact. As near as I can judge, in a quarter of a century's constantly moving among Spiritualists, two-thirds of them are firm believers upon hearsay; that is, from reading spiritual publications and hearing lectures rather than from witnessing "spiritual" manifestations.

Spiritualism can be designated a humbug, according to some of the definitions of the word, without implying that every medium is a wilful deceiver. I hav repeatedly declared that it is a bubble so far as the spiritual idea is concerned. In that sense it is a gigantic delusion from alpha to omega; a wholesale deception; the most astonishing mania of any age. This is my conviction in the absence of all evidence to the contrary.

There are many Spiritualists who denounce Christianity as a stupendous humbug. Does that mean that Spiritualists who once believed Christianity true, who honestly experienced religion, felt the power of the Holy Ghost, then repudiated it, and accepted Spiritualism, are dishonest? That is Lynn logic. This disposition among so many Spiritualists to stamp out a man's character for honesty because he once stood with them firmly on the doctrin of the existence and communication of spiritual beings has an orthodox, sulphur odor about it, and tends to prove that they are out of argument.

Mr. Lynn says that for years I "professed to be a believer and teacher of this system when he was admitted to our homes and confidence."

I not only "professed," but was a believer and teacher. Does that mean that I was bound to teach the same doctrin after I had lost confidence in its truth? Because many of you Spiritualists were once admitted to the homes and confidence of Christians, did it follow that because of such hospitality you were forever precluded from changing your convictions? I hav heard some Christians go a little farther and say that there are Spiritualists indebted for all they are to Christianity, even their education was paid for by Christian charity. It is a limping objection in either case, for it is not a question of hospitality or sociability, but of intellectual conception.

George says, "He must hav known long before he donned the garb of Materialism that it [Spiritualism] and himself were frauds."

Now, my friend, how do you know that? You write as confident about what my motivs and professions and principles were as you do about spirits and their land. As I happen to know how very badly you are mistaken about the one, I can hav but little confidence in the other. The trouble with some Spiritualists is that they giv loose rein to their conjectures.

When we detect them making groundless assertions about earthly affairs, we cannot be expected to credit them with knowledge of spiritual things.

"He must hav known long before he donned the garb of Materialism that it and himself were frauds."

No, George, I abandoned Spiritualism piece-meal; and, moreover, had you really known about what you undertake to write instead of guessing at it, you would hav known that I never hesitated an hour to publicly and privately state my skepticism of any point that I once believed. My growing tendency to uncompromising Freethought Materialism was a standing objection to my ministrations in many Spiritual circles and societies. I doubted the spiritual origin of many dark circles as early as 1863. In less than two years after I gave up dark circles entirely, as affording no proof of spirit communication. For ten years longer I never claimed more than from one-tenth to three-tenths of the phenomena as spiritual in origin. Finally, after much sifting, I discovered that I had not one positiv fact left, and then concluded I had no right to call myself a Spiritualist. I studied Materialism during the last few years I was a Spiritualist, with the avowed determination to overthrow it in argument. To that end also I studied some branches of physical science theoretically and practically. I awoke to the fact that modern Materialism on a scientific basis is a very different thing to that of even a generation ago. I started out to overthrow it, but it tripped me. And because, forsooth, I had the independence to avow my acceptance of Materialism, Spiritualists all over the land impugn the purity of my motivs. But Mr. Lynn in his attack on me has violated his own profession where he says, "What I seek is a broad, free, cultured man and womanhood, one that places integrity and justice first, one that is as willing to concede honesty of purpose in others as to claim it for himself."

Then why, if you do not openly charge dishonesty upon your neighbor, do worse, insinuate it? I differ from you in your ideas about Materialism, Spiritualism, and, perhaps, logic. But that is no proof that you are honest or that I am the reverse.

No person, I think, has a right, without positiv proof, to charge, or meaner yet, insinuate through public print or word of mouth that a fellow-being is not as sincere in his convictions as he himself. You may be a little surprised (in view of the repeated falsifications of my teachings through Spiritual publications) when I tell you that never in my whole life hav I charged fraud upon any medium without positiv proof. I do not know what you may think about it, but I believe a perfectly honest man credits others with the same noble trait in absence of proof to the contrary. Do you not think this is a good rule? Yours respectfully, W. F. JAMIESON.

Concerning the Declaration, Again.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please say to your readers, and especially to our friend "W. H. B.," that I hav read the latter's reply to my late "discourse" upon the Declaration, with much interest, and am glad to know that thus far we differ so little; and that only a great press of literary work, together with many other imperious cares, prevents my making immediate rejoinder. I will make response at my early leisure (with your permission, Mr. Editor). Meanwhile, and until convinced by Mr. Burr to the contrary, I shall "hold," let me repeat, the Declaration as miserable political jugglery, in the main, and will endeavor to make it clear that everybody else should so regard it.

A HATER OF SHAMS.

Highland Park, Conn., June 5, 1881.

Organization.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The needs of the hour and the importance of the work demand the most thorough organization of all our forces, in order that we may secure that measure and character of liberty to which every child, woman, and man is entitled that is a citizen or denizen of this republic.

The large class who believe in the principles of "constructiv Liberalism" are numerically strong, but for lack of effectiv organization exceedingly weak. Observing the dangerous tendencies arising from nearly all political and religious organizations, the tendency has been to ignore all unity of action that savors in the least like them in the propagation of ideas and principles. On this rock has been wrecked and frittered away the greater part of our usefulness for practical reform. Because many hav misused the powers of mind and body to enslave, we hav loitered away the time in lack of physical effort and with a mental supineness unworthy the principles of justice we profess, and the pure desires for human welfare that seem on fitful occasions to inspire us.

The enemies of secular government are always on the alert. They work effectivly through unity of action. Their vigilance and sincerity are commendable. It is folly to suppose for one moment that our opponents are hypocritical or insincere, when all history demonstrates that the most conscientious are the greatest workers and the most dangerous when conscience is abnormally influenced by superstitious and religious principles.

Under these influences they will make any sacrifices for God or his cause. Their combined strength is concentrated for the destruction of all and everything that militates against the glory of the most high, and the advancement and perpetuation of his reign, as administered through his servants, the ministers and priests, and submitted to by his subjects, the great body of the people.

The simple questions for us to consider are, Shall this earnest united element rule this republic and destroy our chartered and natural rights, as expressed in the Declaration of Independence, and written on the "constitution of man," and be allowed to dictate the terms for the latitude of the press, the voice, with absolute control over what shall or shall not be proper mail matter, or whether we will work unitedly and in dead earnest for that liberty that shall bring the largest possible measure of impartial freedom to each without working the least partial injustice to any?

No great reform was ever accomplished without constant and persevering effort. The incipient and middle stages are always attended with poverty, girdled with misrepresentation, and burdened with indifference, at least such is the record that history thus far presents.

Can we not to-day, my friends, show a marked improvement? May we not take counsel of the rapid strides of science and mechanism, and with a "long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether" drive the "car of progress" at a higher rate of speed—one that will be in keeping with the spirit of the age, and the enlarged understanding of human rights and duties?

T. C. Leland is the right man in the right place. We hav a right to be proud of his ability, integrity, and industry.

The objects of the Liberal League are such as should commend themselvs to every honest mind; but because they do not is the reason for their necessity and propagation. We need not expect that any secretary will perform the arduous duties of that position unless he meets with a proper degree of encouragement in all needed directions.

These things are essentials, money, writers, talkers, and fiends of all work. The first, though seemingly hard to procure, should be, and would be, the least to obtain, did Liberals see the absolute necessity of the work to be done, and the important part it (money) plays in its execution.

This fact is patent that few Liberals are so destitute of means at some time during the year as not to be able to giv one dollar at the close or beginning of every six months, and certainly few are so suspicious that they would not trust the secretary of the National Liberal League to use it effectivly.

Let us look matters squarely in the face. In the first place, are the principles we advocate an improvement on those we strive to displace? And in the second place, are we as sincere to displace the old, narrow, and despotic as they are to prevent the advent of the new and equitable?

If Liberalism makes us indifferent to the success of principles we deem so important as to be willing to subject ourselvs to the shafts of ridicule and the venom of malignant superstition to uphold, it certainly needs some added stimulus to shake off the disgraceful lethargy.

That stimulus, my friends, is thorough organization. This will giv us coherence and solidity.

Let us at once cease basking in the lazy sunshine and the (ought to be) worn-out pastures of useless individualism.

Let us realize the fact that "it is not good for man to be alone;" let us take in the women and children, and hav Leagues everywhere. If we desire it we can make our meetings very attractiv, and even respectable, and while we would not ignore, but encourage individualism, each independent soul should feel its dependence, for each is made stronger and better by a true union of "hands and hearts."

We shall never be a power for great good till we are thus united; till all feel that his or her work is to aid as best they may in securing for others the liberty and equity they claim for themselvs.

As Liberal Spiritualists or Materialists we can doubtless with little effort find causes of difference enough to keep brother Jamieson and others on the lecture stump for all time. It is no digression to say I think such work very ill-timed under present circumstances, for until our union secures perfect freedom of the press and mails all such antagonizing efforts seem an impertinence, and bode no good to the most needed work of the hour.

Am I right in supposing that in proportion to the grand sweep of the principles of liberty and justice should be our measure of enthusiasm for their success? or am I to think from the apparent inactivity in our ranks that Liberalism, like the influence of tropical heat, while feasting the mind with beauty enslaves it with lassitude?

If hitherto we hav been indifferent, let us shake off the enervating incubus and stand "redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled," determined from henceforth to tread the higher planes of human duty and responsibility.

The world waits for the redemption we seek to accomplish, and as no child's play will avail a particle to put to rout the well-drilled hosts of superstition, we should each and all be baptized in the spirit of "Arnold Winkelried," who at the head of his little band threw himself on Austrian spears, shouting, "Make way for liberty!"

This is my method: Organize as rapidly as possible the Leagues, and let each League contribute liberally the sinews of war to the secretary of the National Liberal League. Where there are no Leagues let each Liberal see the necessity of giving at least $1 semi-annually, and as many as possible become life-members. I rather incline to the $10 view of life-membership, with the understanding that none are debarred or excused from giving more if able, or their consciences are thoroughly educated up to the high-water mark of human justice and mental freedom.

Those of us who cannot get along without our side-shows (and I guess I am of the number), let us take them independent of this movement. In our old antislavery meetings Christians and Infidels met in genuin accord. George B. Cheever could sit side by side with Whittier, and the most rigid Sabbatarian could tolerate Garrison, Wright, and Pillsbury.

Our work is a special one. Let us organize for its success. Wendell Phillips says, One thing at a time; and to-day the one thing most needful is to make this country at least sacred and secure to human liberty in the largest and best sense.

We hav no desire to interfere with the rights and freedom of the church; on the contrary, we will contend earnestly for all justly its due. We only ask the church not to cripple the state, to cease from clinging to it, barnacle-like, for sustenance and support. Let it stand or fall on its own merits, and cease its everlasting interference with the rights of those who ignore its claims and deny its assumptions.

Is this Liberalism? and if so, who will put their hands to this plow and do their part in cultivating the soil, so that ere long we can reap the needed harvest of a higher and better condition of human enjoyment and happiness?

Our first duty is to strengthen the hands and cheer the hearts of those that are already in the harness and whose burdens are too heavy to bear; a cheerful word, accompanied with the needed lubricator, will help amazingly to revive waning hopes and infuse new life.

Let us, one and all, say the word, grease the wheels, and set the car of progressiv organization on its trip with increased momentum.

Yours for organization, GEORGE LYNN.

ONE man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. He that regardeth the day, regardeth it unto the Lord; and he that regardeth not the day, to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth, eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks; and he that eateth not to the Lord, he eateth not, and giveth God thanks. For none of us liveth to himself, and no man doeth to himself.—Romans, xiv, 5-7.

DEADWOOD, DAKOTA TER., June 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am forty-seven years old to-day, and intend to make myself a birthday present of Freethought literature that has not yet been written. Inclosed find $5 for the same. Please don't tax your powers in writing up your travels, nor tire yourself in the least, as you must hav done on the trip last fall. Do make this voyage one of pleasure and recreation for yourself. Write no more than what is pleasurable and restful for you. We shall all be better satisfied with smaller volumes and a less number if they are in no way related to tired limbs and aching eyes. I, for one, want to think of you while absent as entirely free from care or labor of any kind. Hoping that the gods will take care of you and yours while absent, and in due time bring you safely back to report the progress of humanity in other lands, I am, as ever, Yours, D. P. WILCOX.

[We wish to assure our friend that the proposed journey is not for ease, pleasure, or personal enjoyment. We expect to labor during our absence much as we do when at home. We shall undoubtedly spend many hours in writing which others pass in sleep, and we shall not begrudge the efforts if thereby our friends are pleased or benefited. Our greatest pleasure consists in affording satisfaction to our readers.—ED. T. S.]

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $5.00 postal order which I pledged for your trip around the world. Hoping that you may hav a pleasant journey and safe return, I remain, Yours truly, HIRAM THOMAS.

BRAINTREE, MASS., May 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I hand you my check for my subscription, $5.00 to the round-the-world fund, with my best wishes for a pleasant and useful journey and a safe return. Respectfully, J. MORRISON.

LIVERPOOL, N. Y., May 21, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND: I hav postponed sending for your use the inclosed root of evil, as it has been called by our best contemporaries, although they are all clamoring to get their share or more, even those who preach not to care "for the morrow, what ye shall eat or wherewithal ye shall be clothed." I wish you a prosperous voyage and safe return. May you liv to see right prevail, and all myths swept away, is the sincere wish of your friend C. S. STERLING, M. D.

GATES, MO., May 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As you say the required number of persons hav expressed their willingness to send you around the world, I also send my "V" for a copy of your travels. I am satisfied that if you liv to make the journey the world will be very much wiser for it, as you see everything and know exactly how to tell it. Yours truly, MARY R. CHILD.

WOODSTOCK, VT., May 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I send you, according to promis, to help defray the expenses of the round the world trip a postal order of $5.00. Please accept my best wishes for your health and happiness on your journey and a safe return back to meet the wishes of your looked-for return by your better half. My best respects to her, and may she be buoyed up in your absence with a hope, and may she be well cared for by friends in your absence.

Yours in friendship, JOHN D. POWERS.

EPHRAIM, May 27, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Please find inclosed $5, which I cheerfully send to you, according to promis, and wish you good luck on the trip round the world. If you should hap[illegible]en to meet Jesus on the way to the Holy Land, please tell him to hurry and come, for we need him here now. These government officials that the devil sends us will not let us liv up to our religion according to the way that he has revealed to us; and we can't enslave women and make brutes of ourselvs as we would like to without being constantly in danger of these hellhounds on our track, and we look to him for aid in this hour of affliction. Take good care of yourself, Bro. Bennett, and we will await your return with great pleasure.

A friend of Freethought, R. CLAWSON.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find $5.00, my promised share in your contemplated trip around our globe. I hav never been very favorably impressed with your making such a trip, but as you hav decided to go, and your friends hav insisted on your going, perhaps it may turn out all for the best, and I hope it may, and that you may hav a good time, a pleasant trip, and a safe return home. But such a trip will be no child's play, even to a much younger man than yourself. You should not go alone, but hav a good and faithful companion. You can find some thorough-going whole-souled Infidel that will volunteer to accompany you, that has ample means to make the trip. I know that Infidels are very commonly poor, the why I don't know, unless it is on account of their honesty; yet there are some that are abundantly able to bear the expenses of such a trip. If I were a younger man and had the means I would jump at the chance of making such a trip.

If you should visit the Holy Land, it would hardly pay to spend much time in hunting for the Garden of Eden, where Jahveh built up Adam out of mud, and where the devil, in the shape of a snake, got the better of old Jahveh in the fruit business, or to hunt up the precise spot where the whale landed Jonah, or the place where the barren fig-tree stood. Of course it isn't there now, but had to die on account of the terrible "cussin" it got for not bearing better. I dare say, however, you may meet with persons who will point out these places and a great many more, such as the place where Christ cast out the legion of devils that entered the herd of swine. It would be interesting to the true believer to hav a view of that hillside where that drove of hogs went rushing down into the sea, but not quite so interesting to you, perhaps. This was a most wonderful performance, indeed, but it must be confessed it was a little rough on the poor hogs. No wonder they couldn't bind the man possessed of the legion of devils, even with the strongest of iron chains, when this same legion was sudden death to two thousand hogs as soon as they entered them. The only wonder is that he hadn't taken Christ by the nape of his neck and the seat of his pants and hurled him into the sea. This would hav saved the poor swine; but I suppose one man is of more value than two thousand hogs, though perhaps the owner of the swine would hardly think so. No doubt they will show you the mountain where the devil carried Jesus and showed him all the kingdoms of the world, "and all these things I will giv thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me," said he. But Jesus was a "leetle" too sharp for the devil, and ordered him to worship old Jahveh. The devil seems to hav been a little frightened, and left. Angels came and administered unto him, that is, I suppose, took him down off the mountain. Jesus generally worsted the devil, it seems, yet neither he nor his old father, Jahveh, ever attempted to kill him, which they should hav done, and thus at one stroke rid the world of all evil.

They will most likely show you the Mount of Olives and Calvary, and perhaps the identical stone that the angel rolled away from the sepulcher, and a great many holy places and relics too numerous to mention in that holy land.

With regard to the missionaries, if you can only get a peep behind their curtain, you may be able to tell a tale that may startle honest, sincere Christians themselvs. It will be difficult to get at the facts on account of not understanding the languages, and the missionaries will hardly be likely to enlighten you on that score. I am of the opinion that if the truth were known the missionary business has a mighty black record. Respectfully, J. M. KING.

NASHVILLE, MICH., June 5, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav had my eye on your prospects of getting money enough to swing around the circle, but hav said nothing. I now see that the prospects are good; therefore I send you money order for $5 to aid you on the trip. I am glad the Liberals hav concluded to hav a truthful account of countries that you will pass through, and the manners and customs of their inhabitants. I do not often advise people, but in this instance I would say you need hav no fear of God or the devil, but you had better look out a little for those missionaries who are always on your track. I wish you good health, plenty of cash to make the trip, and a safe return to your office again, to giv us the history of your travels, as agreed. Your co-worker, LEMUEL SMITH.

HICKORY GROVE, KY., June 1, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: You will excuse my tardiness in sending in my $5, will you not? Inclosed please find $5 to assist to send you round the world. I send a "V" to help abolish this thing they call the Christian religion; and to see the true thing of what is going on in this frowning shell we liv on, and various things. I like to read your Infidel paper, as the Christians call it. Luck be with you in all far lands. I hope most of the donors will come to time; and when you print a volume or so, or when you are ready to deliver the book, send one to

Yours truly, C. H. MOORE.

GREEN LAKE, MICH., May 29, 1881.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Your circular of 10th inst. duly read. As one of those who employ our editor as agent to circumnavigate this little planet, I hav previously suggested some objects of interest, and would add that some items of political matter would afford interesting reading, such as the collecting of revenues from the famin-stricken nativs of India, statistics of population, rate and ratio of taxation in China; courts of law, jails, etc. If practicable, see the noted wall, that we may hav witness whether it coincides with the incredible accounts in school books. Not that these topics possess any direct interest, but to obtain reliable statements from one who does not look through the blinding goggles of musty traditional superstition, or like politicians, hav a one-sided view to support their own theory or party's interests. I doubt not it has already occurred to your mind, but nevertheless I will suggest that in case of emergency a sort of official letter of introduction to representativs of the United States in foreign lands might prove valuable.

Inclosed I remit for one share. Having room, I will just remark that Mr. Mair seems to my mind like the common barnyard fowl trying to fight a stout gobbler-turkey that, overpowered, crushed down, and trampled, soon as liberated will bristle up, and challenge the combat anew. No attention is due from me to the stupid bigot who claims merit or demerit on the grounds of bias of mind, called belief or unbelief. The valuable pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in my view, would be much better occupied with the current news of the day.

Hoping your outfit will prove ample, complete, and success and health attend, I remain yours,

FRANKLIN PECK.

MODESTO, CAL., May 27, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am right glad that you hav fully decided to go and explore the birthplace and home of the Christian God, Jesus, whose followers hav done so much to curse humanity. What you will accomplish in that direction, showing up the so-called "Holy Land," will amply supplement what you can do at the helm of the goodly old TRUTH SEEKER.

I know you will encounter peculiar and serious difficulties, but I hope you will overcome them all and make a successful voyage, for we are all on the qui vive to be fed for a change on the marvelous stories and legends of those far-off lands which gave us the Bible system. One consolation certainly is that you will find it easier to travel now than the Israelites did when led by God Almighty Jehovah. It took them forty years to cross a desert about one hundred miles—about three and a half miles a year. These Jews and their offspring, Christians, are certainly slow any way. We scientific men are faster and more powerful than their God Jehovah, for we can quickly cut our way through the desert; yes, accomplish it in three hours. To cross the Red Sea you will want no Moses with a rod. Great steamships built expressly for that purpose, and special machinery has been invented, adapted to that sea, will waft you across in a short time, and no sacrifices of bullocks will be demanded on the opposit shore. Again, you will reach the "Promised Land" carried on coaches, drawn by iron horses from ocean to ocean, and this successful operation, the work of man, will attract but little attention, possibly a passing notice from Jehovah, Jesus, or Ghost.

Men are so far superior to these three that they scarcely ask any advice from them now. They build steamers, railroads, lay thousands of miles of submarine lines; nay, they hav included in the telegraphic circuit by a common bond all parts of our planet and no glory hallelujah to any nigger human divinity. What a change! In fact these facilities for rapid and easy intercommunication will in time tend to make wars between nations few, and it is to be hoped Jehovah, the God of man, will not be mad and wrathful, and cast a thunderbolt at you for having done so much to deter mankind from continually gazing at him in the clouds and giving him thanks for helping in those grand works which man taught him and his followers—works of peace and civilization.

Now, Bennett, go and decipher the secrets of the holy of holies. It is an inviting field of enterprise, and with the energy and determination which characterize you, you will succeed. I inclose you my mite—a "V"—to help you on, and hope those who hav promised will send at once, and those who hav not will immediately do so, and were I rich enough I would go with you and see that good old Mother Nature would giv you her blessings on the way.

I hope your New York friends will giv you a royal parting farewell. Accept my kind regards, while I hope for your safe return to your family and to us.

Respectfully, A. A. GILMOUR, M.D.

P. S.—Our Liberal friend, Dr. J. L. York, of San Jose, Cal., delivered last week a series of Liberal lectures to the people of Modesto, commanding pretty good audiences. His lectures were highly appreciated by the Liberal, thinking people. He spoke, as it were, under inspiration, denouncing roundly the cant of the day. I would strongly recommend him to all Liberals. He came by invitation of C. C. Luther, our ex-president of the Modesto Liberal League. Mr. Luther, one of the most activ workers in our cause, made a brief report of his visit there to different Liberal papers, hence the shortness of this report. A. A. G.

BRAIDWOOD, ILL., May 20, 1881.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I inclose $2 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the balance of the year. There is some discussion about your going round the world. I say go, if you think your strength sufficient. But don't let the Arabs kill you or the Fijians eat you up; that is all. Yours, FERRIS BURR.

PAOLA, KAN., May 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Daniel Pettingill desires to continue his subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. He hands me $3, which please find inclosed for that purpose. This I am glad to do for two reasons: first, I get the reading of his paper after he reads it. Then he is a poor old man, and was badly crippled by a run-away team and can't get to town. Let me say the cause of Freethought was never so prosperous as now in all this free West. The people themselvs hav decided to hold their own meetings, and depend upon home talent. In many localities the majority of the citizens are outspoken Liberals. Secular funerals are quite common, and the preachers begin to see their power is waning. Being a Spiritualist myself, I accept the Materialistic philosophy, and hand in hand with the great brotherhood of Materialists will march with them to the grave, and will not quarrel with them if they lie down there to rest from their labors. But I prefer to still prosecute my journey, and expect to meet these grand workers beyond the lines of crude materiality. For the truth, J. T. HAUGHEY.

D. M. BENNETT: You are still editoring that blaggard TRUTH SEEKER afther the dose I giv yees afore. Sure I suppose ye are beware of the fact that I regularly contributed an able article a while back. Five or six children out here repinted of their sins, and had their skirts sprinkled until they were white as snow.

Begorry now, don't be afther keeping on in your ould way afther the little five and six-year-old children hav forsaken their sins and made up with Jesus. "The way is as plain as the face on a man's nose, and no fool, though he be a man, can err therein." Bedad, an' there's scripchure for yees!

It is a silf-ivi. ent fact, as I hav proved, that ye are on the wide track, while I am on the narry; an' if yees will take my advice I'll make it all right with God, an' git yees ter hiven on a half ticket. Stop workin' forninst poor, prosecuted Christianity, "keep afraid of God, and begin to be wise" (more scripchure).

Hopin' this will cause the shells to drap off your eyes, I remain, Sufficiently yours, TIM FLAHERTY.

DUNDEE, N. Y., May 9, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find a city draft for $3 to apply in payment for the current volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

My dear friend, if I did not suppose you surfeited with eulogy, I would add or indulge in a few expressions of praise. Suffice it to say, since I met you in Watkins, N. Y., I hav followed you closely in your meanderings in person and thoughts, as expressed in your writings. If you make the talked-of circuit of our planet I hope to be able to advance the $5 for the promised volumes, but shall hav to defer that treat for the present. Yours, J. J. HOLLETT.

Ihpetonga.*

[From a forthcoming volume of poems by Mr. Wm. Wilson, now printing at the publishing-house of D. M. Bennett, we extract the following as of special local interest. We suspect that many of our readers who were born in this city will gain some important historical information about their nativ place from the pen of an English poet.]

Gone and forever are the whoops of Canarsie [a,]
No more doth the bushwood conceal the dark foe;
No more do the Rockaways [b] hunt through the cedars
Which lined the broad beach stretching out to the sea.

Gone are the vinyards and the surf-sprinkled plum-trees [c]
Which lured to Manhattan young Hudson the brave;
No more do we barter the skins of our island,
As did the wild Indian who dwelt on our shores.

When the Half Moon [d] bore down on the white sands of Coney
The wild wolf was heard through the tall, pointed pines,
While out through the surf came the clamoring nativs
To meet the brave crew as they rowed for the shore.

Their powwows they raised to the spirit of evil,
And offered the wampum surrounding their bodies
For beads and for trinkets the white men presented,
And friendship cemented the hour of their landing.

Down through the decades has passed the strange story
Which gave to the river surrounding Manhattan
A name that 'midst nations is spoken with pride,
And hailed as the conduit of ne'er-dying freedom.

Columbus, the Spaniard, in the hight of his prowess
Ne'er dreamed that the fleets of the world would be anchored
Breast deep on the waters which Hudson since named
While up through Gowanus [e] his Dutch ship was steered.

When they gazed on the woods of the high Ihpetonga,
Which towered o'er the stream in the front of Manhattan,
While sported the savage his tree-formed canoe,
Fresh freighted with furs from the wolf and the beaver.

The glass beads of Amsterdam paid for the treasures
For which the wild savage had toiled through the season,
Yet happy was he the bright gewgaws to gather,
And gave for the baubles the fruits of his labor.

. . . . . .

But changed is the scene since the advent of Hudson,
For the hands of the white man hav leveled the woodlands,
And the dusky-browed savage has gone to his fathers,
And left Ihpetonga the queen of the ocean.

The wigwams were cleared for the home of the white man,
The loom took the place of the bow and the arrow,
The ax and the adze then fashioned the timbers
And built the proud ships which were launched on our waters.

No more o'er the woodlands or down by the river,
Where proud Ihpetonga has lifted her head,
Do we hear the wild whoop of the red-painted Indian,
And the howl of the wolf in the forest is ended.

But up from the sea rose the white sands of Coney,
And gave us the island, the pride of our country,
Where men of all nations can mingle for pleasure,
And pass the hot months 'midst the spray of its waters.

The rich and the lowly, the proud and the humble,
Send back to the fatherland tales of their sporting
On the banks of the ocean where Hudson first landed,
Far back in the decades among the wild savage.

How little we think as we sport in the waters
Of the terrible scenes which gave to the white man
The right to the island from the savage Canarsies,
Who fought to the death for the land of their fathers.

*Iphetonga (pronounced Ifatonga), the ancient Indian name for Brooklyn Hights and the shores of Long Island southward.

[a] Name of a tribe of Indians.

[b] Another tribe of Indians.

[c] At the time of Hudson's landing the shore was lined with vines and plum-trees growing close to the water's edge. What was then the beach is now two miles out under the water.

[d] Name of the ship in which Hudson came to this country.

[e] The Gowanus Creek and Bay formerly extended through to Coney Island and up to what we now know a Brooklyn Hights. Their channels hav since then beens partly filled and built upon.

"'Tis Reason Leads People Astray."

BY ROBERT CUMMING.

The advance guard of orthodox sages,
The heroes of life's narrow way,
A warning note blew for all ages,
"'Tis reason leads people astray."

The note filled the phonograph pulpit,
So is heralded down to this day;
And simpletons, open-mouthed, gulp it,
For "reason leads people astray."

You may think it a simple delusion,
But the truth of it none can gainsay;
For each, as he hugs that conclusion,
Is the next led by reason astray.

Thinking "reason is damnable treason,"
Some concluded to hav faith and pray;
But alas! what conclusion's in reason?
"'Tis reason leads people astray."

Lake Hades may loom on the morrow,
Wild waves in the lurid light play,
But I think, like the children of sorrow,
"'Tis reason leads people astray."

They argue that reason deceives us,
And, of course, thus reasoning, they
Are the first it deceives, and it grieves us
That "reason leads people astray."

Let me stray. Let them burn me like stubble,
The high court my sentence must say;
As for theirs, they hav spared court the trouble,
And follow their reason astray.

If an orthodox thought might avail them,
It is this glad suggestion I make,
By the boot-straps, when all reason fails them,
Let them lift themselvs over the lake.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable!  You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Important to Invalids. The Most Marvelous Invention in the World

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING
IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.

Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.

Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.

Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.

Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.

Our depots are open free for inspection to all classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abandon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.

NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.

JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

I would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that at fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed nnder the infinence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed nnadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this tronble. T. DET. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DET. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolntely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk abont and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

No. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the WILSONIA GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their conscieuces for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, and die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

THE worst action in the way of interference in mundane matters of which the God of the New Testament is guilty is, perhaps, the sudden slaughtering of Ananias and Sapphira. But what is this to such enormities as the deluge, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, or the commission of bears to devour little children for remarking the baldness of a prophet? Horrors like these, so consistent with the general mode of procedure of the ancient Jehovah, are wholly incompatible with the characteristics so often ascribed to the more recent Gods.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

THE chief benefit which religion ever conferred upon mankind, whether in ancient or in modern times, was undoubtedly the oath. The priests taught that if a promis was made in the name of the gods, and that promis was broken, the gods would kill those "who took their name in vain." Such is the true meaning of the third commandment. Before that time treaties of peace and contracts of every kind in which mutual confidence was required could only be effected by the interchange of hostages. But now, by means of this purely theological device, a verbal form became itself a sacred pledge. Men could at all times confide in one another, and foreign tribes met freely together beneath the shelter of this useful superstition which yet survives in our courts of law.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

IN cases of suicide we should look not barely at the action, but take motivs, character, and results into accouht before we say of any external action whatever that it is of itself crime or virtue. The same act may be the grandest thing or the basest in the world; but it is previous character which determins this and the estimates of motivs and consequences. Therefore let each case be tried by its own merits and judged by its own worth. Let not law come in with a sweeping condemnation and pronounce its anathema upon those who may, perchance, hav been acting quite as consistently with the great dictates of our nature as the legislators and judges themselvs. The only scripture precept is the prohibition, "Thou shalt not kill," a law which orthodoxy interprets with at least such limitations as to prevent it interfering either with the hero or the hangman.—W. T. Fox.

IT IS to be hoped that Christian communities will be led seriously to consider the important question whether it is right any longer to read the Jewish scriptures promiscuously in churches, or commend them in the mass as divine oracles to the unlearned people. It must be obvious to all that scandals and dangers result from the practice. Such passages as those relating to the destruction of the heathen Canaanites and the occupation of their land; to the treatment of Gentiles generally; to the tortures inflicted by David (the "man after God's own heart") on prisoners of war; to the punishment of misbelief or religious perversion with death; to the execution of witches; to the use of the ordeal; to acts of patriarchs, deemed moral in a primitiv state, but which are now moral no longer, and even many of them relating to a religious system of ceremony, sacrifice, and vicarious atonement, ought surely to be removed from the lectionary [i. e., be no longer read publicly in churches].—Toronto Bystander for April, 1881.

How can we be otherwise than wearied by the reiteration of the idea that the chimera called God is the source of the principles and laws which are interwoven with substance and exert a controling influence both in the scientific and moral world. How crude and unphilosophic appears the notion that we are indebted to a deity for the idea of love, justice, or forgivness; that the neglect of these principles is an offense to him instead of being a blow aimed at the foundations of the universe! If love is only a quality attributed to a personality, what becomes of the generalization called goodness? Plato styled God the fountain of general ideas, including goodness, as if that which was never evoluted could illustrate anything but facts. Such heathenish views could perhaps be held only by theologians who are in the habit of twisting their faculties into any shape to suit the requirements of orthodoxy. If the humblest man prefers good to evil, he is a fountain of love equally with the Almighty. Theology incapacitates the mind for tracing out the first faint beginnings of those useful ideas which so often flash out upon us in our moral darkness, illumining our social relations with a steady light, pure and renovating as the blaze of the noonday sun.—Alhaza.

THE Protestant prides himself on rejecting the foolish doctrins and beliefs of the "ignorant Catholic," but Arnold speaks a pertinent truth when he says, "The mental habit of him who imagins Balaam's ass spoke in no respect differs from the mental habit of him who imagins that a madonna of wood or stone winked." We are all full of prejudices, whims, and superstitions. We are children of habit, and need to be ever on guard against doing things by nature, and believing in things because we hav gotten in the way of doing so. We must keep up the spirit of inquiry and investigation within ourselvs as well as in the minds of others. We must now and then ask of our own reason why it accepts this or rejects that, or before we know it we shall simply believe from mere habit. We should also be chary of thinking how much more we know than others do, for this makes us self-conceited, and we begin to think we are wise enough, when the fact is the very greatest and strongest mind on earth is barely able to grasp the outside edges of a few scattering bits of foam on the great shore of the vast sea of universal knowledge. And this thought of how little it is possible for us to acquire out of the great and boundless whole should make us cultivate a broad charity and a sweet, loving tenderness for others in their shortcomings as to belief and action. We must be patient, loving, and kind to those who are swallowing foolish doctrins and creedal dogmas that we hav left behind, or rags and rubbish that we hav outgrown and cast away.

"Let's cease this everlasting growl,
Be gentle, kind, and tender,
And if the world is bad, we'll join
And do our best to mend her."

Odds and Ends.

IT is a wise man that knows on which side his bread is oleomargarined.

SOME men are always trying to begin at the top, unmindful of the fact that it is all folly to shingle the house until after the cellar is dug.—New Haven Register.

BETSY and I are out,
("Twas the deacon spoke
As the old mare shied.
And the anxle broke),
Betsy and I are out. —Revised Pome.

"A SCIENTIST named Mivart will soon issue a work on the cat," says the New Haven Register. We've done done that already. It was a heavy copy of Shakspere's plays, and we issued it from a third-story window, and it took her right between the shoulders, and we hope it broke her blamed back.—Boston Post.

A WRITER in Appleton's Journal occupies several pages of that publication in an effort to prove that there is no such thing as womanly intuition. Some night when this gentleman comes home about 13 o'clock, and tries to sneak into bed without waking the baby, he will discover the fallacy of his theory.

A HARTFORD man sent a pair of trousers to his tailor to be repaired. The tailor found $300 in a roll in his pocket and returned it, receiving the thanks of the owner thereof. When we send a pair of trousers to our tailor to be reconstructed, and he finds $300 in the pockets and returns it, we always tell him to keep the trousers for his honesty, which is the best policy.—Norristown Herald.

GILLHOOLY asked a Galveston lawyer what he thought of the assassination of the czar. "Well," replied the Galveston lawyer, stroking his chin, and looking as wise as three or four Solomons, "I think the man who done the shooting ought to hav change of venue on account of public prejudice against him. I'd get him out of the scrape if he was over here—and had plenty of money."—Galveston News.

IT was in the smoking-room of an Atlantic steamer that a worthy Teuton was recently talking about weather forecasts. "Look here," said he, "I dell you vat it is. You better don't take no shtock in dem weather bredictions. Dese beople don't know noding. Dey can't dell no better as I can." "But, my dear sir," said a person present, "they foretold the storm which we hav just encountered." "Vell, dat ish so," said the Teuton, contemplativly; "but I tell you vat it is, dat shtorm vould hav come yust de same if it had not been bredicted."

"MA," said a Cass avenue urchin with dirt-covered knuckles and a pocket full of marbles, "is it wicked to play marbles for keeps?" "Yes, my son, and you must never do it." "Is it wicked when you lose all the time?" "Yes, just the same." "Is it wicked if you win all the time and play with a boy who says his mother says if she had your feet she'd never go out except after dark?" "I—I—go and wash your hands and get ready for supper!" was the sharp reply, and the lad continued to play for keeps.—Detroit Free Press.

AWFUL STUPID.—They sat together on the front steps of her residence on Park avenue, and whispered a great many things that would look very silly in print. The moon peeped modestly down on them, and lighted up their faces just enough for it to be observed that he wore a bashful, reserved expression, such a one as always serves to cast a cloud over the more energetic and affectionate grades of love-making. She determined to use a little strategy to draw him out, and induce him to giv her the kiss for which she was just aching. In a cooing voice she said:

"John, suppose we had just come in on a train, and it was raining real hard, so hard we could not think of walking up town, what would we do?"

"Why, wait in the depot till it cleared up, I reckon."

"Yes, but suppose it rained all day, what then?"

"Well, if I couldn't borrow an umbrella, I suppose we would hav to get wet."

"Oh, pshaw, no!" and she stamped her foot impatiently. "If we had a chance wouldn't we take a 'bus?"

"By jove, that's so; I never thought of that; ha, ha, ha, of course we'd get a 'buss and ride home."

She almost ground her teeth with disappointment, and after a few moment's silence, asked,

"Do you ever take 'busses, John?"

"Oh, yes," he replied carelessly, "when I go to a town and it's a long distance from the depot to the hotel, I do."

And she wept at his stupidity.

SOMETHING BEHIND IT.—At a railroad depot, recently, a farmer-looking young man attracted considerable attention from other waiting passengers, by sitting with his arm around the waist of a woman old enough to be his mother, and homely enough to scare a bear into fits. One of the passengers kept such close watch of the pair that the young man finally left his seat, slowly advanced, and remarked:

"Kinder fallish weather we're having now?"

"Yes."

"Going out on the train?"

"Yes."

"You noticed me hugging that woman over there?"

"Yes."

"Do you call her good looking?"

"Good looking! My heavens, she's the homeliest woman I ever saw in my life; I don't want to offend you, but that is my honest opinion."

"Say, that is just my opinion, too," replied the young man, as he lowered his voice. "Did you think I was in love with her?"

"Yes, I reasoned that way."

"There is where you are lame in both legs. I know how old she is and how homely she is, but she is a widder living across the street from us, and I am laboring to induce her to trade me an almost bran new melodeon for an old bass drum. I wish you'd kinder change your seat, and giv me a chance to feed her on gum-drops. She won't melt while she thinks you are watching us, and I can trade that melodeon for a cider mill the minute she gvs me possession."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 8. No. 26. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, June 25, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWY. | $3 per Year

Notes and Clippings.

ABOUT twenty of the Presbyterian clergymen in this city hav begun to use the revised version of the New Testament in their pulpit services.

JEW boys are preferred to any others as office-boys by numbers of Christians in New York. They are found to be exceptionally intelligent and trustworthy.

THE American Union Methodist church at Stapleton, N. Y., was destroyed by fire a few days ago. Did Providence hav any hand in that job, or was it a little private enterprise of the devil?

IT is reported that Col. Ingersoll has brought suit against Peter, alias Thomas Williams, in the United States Circuit Court of Chicago, for publishing his copy-righted lectures in pamphlet form.

THE second Japanese National Exhibition was opened at Tokio on March 1st. The number of exhibitors is upward of 31,000—very nearly double that of those of the first exhibition in 1878.

THE wicked burglars who robbed the church of the Immaculate Conception at Montclair, N. J., and who stole a copy of "Lives of the Saints," had no use for the volume, and hav returned it by mail.

A COUNTY church in Delaware has two parsonages, each of which has been erected by a rival clique. These edifices are some distance apart, and the bewildered pastor is studying as to how he shall divide himself between them.

As the world did not come to an end on the 19th inst., the day some of the Second Adventists prophesied it would, and as hundreds of very pious persons expected, it is safe to conjecture that it may hold out several years yet.

THE existing cedars of Lebanon are only 900 years old. The cypress trees at Montezuma, Mexico, according to a French botanist, are 6,000 years old, and consequently he makes them out coeval with the creation of the world.

A YOUNG lady, who has an objection to the revision of the New Testament, writes to the London Truth to say that the phrase "purple and fine linen" conveys no idea or luxury to her mind, and she suggests, as an improvement, "sealskin and black velvet."

A PRESBYTERIAN church at Elizabeth, N. J., was struck by lightning last Sunday. If it had been a theater instead, there would hav been a howl in all the pulpits next Sunday. It makes a great difference as to what is struck in determining the judgments of heaven.

PEDLERS of the revised New Testament do tolerably well in cities and large villages, but make hardly any sales in the country, where any alteration of the sacred book is generally regarded as awful profanation. The pious women of Welden, Iowa, chased an agent out of town.

A CHINAMAN who died in Boston had a Christian funeral, the services being conducted in church by a Methodist clergyman, and interpreted to the hundred or more Chinamen present by one of their countrymen. The remains were not shipped to China. The question arises, Which heaven will they go to?

A STATUE has recently been found in a mound on the Egyptian railway line. It is believed to be 4,568 years old, and if this is confirmed it will probably be one of the oldest known statues in the world. This statue is about being removed to Cairo. It is about as old as the tower of Babel, and a good deal better preserved.

"E. B." WRITES to the Wine and Spirit Review that while eminent divines like Dr. Howard Crosby assert that the wines of the gospel were real fermented wines, fourth or fifth-rate divines, on the other hand, are unable so to read the sacred book. Meanwhile "the creator himself quietly smiles," etc. This correspondent seems to hav exceptional information.

PRESIDENT BASCOM, of the University of Wisconsin, thinks that if we look broadly at the religious experience of the world we shall "be led to feel that religion is one of the most obscure, confused, variable, and subtle facts in human life." Yes, if we look broadly enough we shall "be led to decide that religion" has been one of the chief curses of the human race.

A NEEDY English curate who was dragging out a weary existence on a meager salary added to his income by repairing watches. Somebody told the bishop, and mourned over the fact that the dignity of the clerical profession was degraded in this way. The bishop sternly replied, "It must be stopped." The way he stopped it was to giv the poor curate a position worth $2,000 a year, which put him beyond the necessity of mending watches.

THE long-continued cool and wet weather has effectually disposed of the army worm on Long Island, and the farmers feel greatly relieved. Millions of the worms are to be seen dead in the grass fields. Before the storm set in the worms had begun their ravages in earnest, and promised to accomplish as much damage as they did last year. Who shall say there is no providence in sending rain; but how about the mission of the army of worms?

PRIVATE letters from Russia show that that unhappy country is confronted by a fresh difficulty. Thirty thousand Græco-Uniates, forcibly converted to orthodoxy in 1875, hav refused to recognize the new faith, and hav resumed their old form of worship, in spite of the threats of the local authorities. The total number of Græco-Uniates driven into the orthodox fold was a quarter of a million, and if these join the malcontents, as they are expected to do, a fresh thorn will develop in Russia's side in Poland.

THE Rev. Joseph Taylor, pastor of the Macedonian Baptist church, Philadelphia, is accused of having been a convict in England, and of coming to this country with money obtained by selling a church which did not belong to him. But Bro. Dobson, who makes the charge, is himself under a slight cloud. When the Salvation Army visited Philadelphia he fell in love with Sister Annie, and married her, notwithstanding his knowledge that she had a living husband. Counter suits for slander hav been instituted.

SYMPTOMS of an outbreak of fanaticism between Hindoos and Mohammedans hav manifested themselvs at Lahore and elsewhere in India, notwithstanding the efforts made by the leading men of both religions to smooth over the differences. The Hindoos are the aggressors and hav given much offense by publishing a pamphlet, which is simply a violent and silly attack upon Mohammedanism. So far the Mohammedans hav shown remarkable patience under circumstances of the most wanton provocation, but it is doubtful how long they will do so.

THE bishop of Amiens has forbidden the clergy and the faithful of his diocese to take any part in "the ridiculous assemblages and illuminations at Ganz" in honor of the pretended apparition of the Virgin. He warns the people of his diocese of the "serious danger which may result to religion from those insane revelries for which impiety would wish to render it responsible." And he appeals to the sound sense of the public to put an end to all such nonsense. This advice put a stop to the performance at Ganz-l'Hospital; but Lourdes and Knock are still flourishing.

THE young gentlemen in the divinity school at Yale who made a specialty of Hebrew hav made their appearance before a critical world as reviewers of the Old Testament. Their first effort is a revision of the prophecy of Habakkuk, which is very suitable for experimenting on, as it contains only three chapters. Their work is now distributed that it may be criticised. Should it meet with general favor they intend to proceed with more of the Old Testament books, possibly completing their work ahead of the regular revisers. Revisers may become so numerous after a while that every Bible man can hav a special reviser of his own.

EXACTLY how much the heathen hav suffered from the depravity of the Sunday-school children at Greenville, N. J., will probably never be ascertained. But it is stated on good authority that the money given to these unscrupulous young persons to put into the missionary boxes has been spent for candy, pop-corn, and other sinful refreshments. Temptation has been placed in the way of these children by the unblushing manner in which the candy merchants of Greenville open their stores and display their merchandise on Sundays. Measures are on foot to compel these dealers to comply with the Sunday law, and thus allow the nickels of the children to take the course originally intended.

M. LITTRE, the distinguished French philologist and philosopher, who died the other day, wrote a noteworthy article on his religious belief not long since entitled, "For the Last Time." In writing this farewell article he searched his conscience to discover if there were any feeble voice which cried to him to enter the fold of Christianity, but he could not discern the faintest whisper. Certain pious persons, he said, were interested in his soul's health. It appeared to them that because he did not hold Christianity in absolute contempt, and because he had often insisted in his writings on the benefits it had rendered humanity, there must be chords in his heart that were ready to vibrate to Roman Catholic truth. He neither expressed repugnance for nor vexation at the solicitude which was manifested by his pious friends.

A CRAZY enthusiast in Philadelphia thought it his duty to offer up somebody as a sacrifice to God. For this purpose he determined to slay a man and his wife who lodged in the same house with him. Rejecting Abraham's intended use of the knife as being too ancient a way of proceeding, he entered the room of his appointed victims with a pistol in his hand, and announced his determination of slaying them. The fellow-lodgers took a different view of human sacrifices, and objected to being offered up without some preliminary rites. It was suggested that the aid of the police be invoked to attend to these preliminaries. The enthusiast saw the propriety of adopting the suggestion, rather than proceeding in what might seem to be indecent haste. While he waited the police came in, and the sacrificial ceremonies were indefinitly postponed. The enthusiast was locked up where it will for the present be out of his power to sacrifice anybody.

A PRACTICAL APPLICATION.—Farmer Allen, of Wakefield, repeated the following in the Albany Conference: "On Sunday morning, while a certain deacon was preparing for church, a wandering wayfarer, or, in modern parlance, a tramp, appeared at his door, pleading his hunger, and begged for something to eat. The deacon looked solemn and frowningly, but reluctantly got a loaf of bread and began to cut it, but while doing so took occasion to admonish the beggar concerning the error of his ways. After reminding him that it was the holy Sabbath which he was desecrating, he asked him if he knew how to pray. 'No,' was the reply. 'Then,' said the deacon, 'I'll learn you,' and he commenced to repeat the Lord's prayer. But just as he uttered the first words, 'Our Father,' the beggar interrupted him with the question, 'What, is he your father and mine, too?' 'Yes,' the deacon replied. 'Why,' exclaimed the beggar, 'we are brothers, then, ain't we? Can't you cut that slice a little thicker?'"

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER X.

After a little while Abbé Dillon took the book which he had laid down, and read:

"'And so,' exclaimed Alamontada, 'it is enough! What else do I want? There is a God, the highest goodness, the highest power, it is no willess, dead, mechanical being, for else would I, who am equipped with consciousness and power of choice, be greater than God! I am of this supreme being full of sanctity and goodness. I am of his race! More I need not for my quietude. I want to die; death does not make me tremble. Can I then perish? Can that which is become nothing? Nothing is a matter of thought, not anything objectiv, working, being, and existing. Can a mere thought become a present object? Are powers which produce changeable phenomena destructible? Then the universe would be destructible; then God himself would be destructible. What insanity! Death is separation of spirit from certain natural forces with which it was united, which we call bodies. The spirit from God imagins its origin. It is in God. Thither it is driven by longing, always from the finite to the infinit, from the changeable into the eternal. This longing to be united again with that to which our nature feels itself more closely related than to powers unconscious of themselves, this longing after perfection is no invention, no childish, arbitrary design, but attraction of the like by the like in the universe from necessity of natural law, just as the magnet must attract the iron that is related to it. This longing livs in all mortals; it only speaks different language when it names heaven or hell Elysium or Tartarus. This longing proves to me nothing but that it is. The indestructibleness of the divine being is a guaranty for the indestructibleness of our spirit. Truly everywhere in nature I see the realm of form change, but I am not aware that that which is moving within them or the cause that produces them ceases. I see, it is true, everywhere in nature phenomena change themselvs, but not the powers which are hidden within them and cause them. Why should I now mock my belief in a God, and fancy to myself that vainly this longing had been planted in my heart, and that the law, which points to eternity in vain in my reason! Why should I now subtilize about the realm of primitiv powers, veiled by its own effects, since I can never understand it, and consequently can never prove that that power which I call "myself" would cease existence when this form of my body falls apart? Why should I believe that that lifeless power which works out a phenomenon that I call an atom, why should I believe that it was from the beginning of all things and will exist for eternity, and on the contrary, the power which I call myself, which produces the loftiest results, soon ends?

"'It was ever an odd mistake by the book-learned that they from information drawn from the nature of the human spirit and the alternate impression of the soul and body, fancied to be able to arrive at proof for or against immortality. These wise philosophers treated the soul somewhat like a building, of whose longer or shorter durability they would be able to judge from the manner in which the different materials were put together, or the quality of these materials. All those efforts have remained in vain up to to-day, because they were thoughtless and childish; the nature of the soul by itself, as well as the being of the body by itself, is unrecognizable because both (soul and body) are observable only in their phenomena. But there is wanting in us as long as we are human beings an eye for the dark world of things proper. It is, consequently, equally foolish to draw proofs for the destructibleness or indestructibleness of the human mind out of that which is unexplorable. All experience forsakes us in this matter because we never hav experience of the primitiv powers, but only of their workings through the instruments of the mind upon the mind.'

"'Really, my dear Almontada,' said I, 'these attempts I hav long since despised as vain. Meanwhile I will not conceal from thee that the other day a passage in a book startled me very much, where just this affair is spoken of, and the author says, "I find everywhere where the race of things continue that the individuals perish." For me there lies some truth in that. Nature, unconcerned about the preservation of the individual, cares only for the continuance of the species, and this is sufficient for the duration of the order of the world. Nature does not care whether myriads of insects perish in a day as if they never had been within the domain of creation, but their genus, their species remains.'

"'Genus?' cried Alamontada, 'species? Are there in the realm of beings proper genera and species? Do you not talk of bodies, of the sensual, that is, of the workings of the powers? Very well, there are genera and species; there the single parts dissolve again and only the fundamental species, remain.

"'It is not improbable that in the realm of powers higher and lower degrees of orders exist. Their changeable unitings and separations among themselvs caused the change of appearances. But each of the primitiv powers obeys, in its uniting with or separation from others, its own eternal law. For that reason is found, in the motley play of phenomena, a perfect uniformity and regularity. A principal power, however, seems to unite subordinate things with each other to that which we call genus and species; and this principal power works unceasingly through eternity; it is the thread that, untorn and indestructible, spins itself on through the magnificent net-work of things. It appears in the germ of the plant, unites itself there, after its own laws, with other matters, so forms, after its own law, the palm and the olive-tree, the grass blade, and the moss, and thus causes to appear what we by natural bodies, by stones, plants, and animals call genus and species. The subordinate powers again separate, after their peculiar laws, from it, and then happens what we term death. But these powers, having entered other germs, begin their play of life over. This continues into eternity. Therefore we say the race and species last, but the individuals perish.

"'Also the human race belongs hither. Here also is a fundamental and principal power for the eternal formation and continuation of the race, as with the plant, as with the animal. But just as the plant stands higher in order through the power of life within it than the stone, and the animal stands higher through the sensitiv, observing soul dwelling withing it than the plant, so man stands higher through his conscious, world-penetrating spirit than the united animal kingdom.

"'Man is one of the primitiv powers of the universe, but vastly different from all that unite themselvs with him, in order to become his tools, that is, to form for him a body. He recognizes himself in his deviation from them. He possesses the feeling of his personality.

"'When the individuals of the world of bodies disappear, when the stone decays, the plant withers, the animal dies, then return the powers which produced the appearance of the individual into the immense crucible of the universe, from which they emerged and become useful in new connections. That is the inner life of the world. It remains eternally the same. Therein is no degree of ennobling, no progress in perfection; stone, animal, plant, as one has seen them thousands of years ago, are still seen to-day. Quite otherwise it is with the spirit of man.'

"'Why otherwise?' I interrupted Alamontada's speech. 'When the separate spirit individuals, after the death of the body, also would flow back to the universal power out of which they came, and desolve themselvs therein? So here also the spiritual individuals would disappear, while the genus, the species, the generally diffused power of thinking would remain.'

"'And if that were,' replied Alamontada, gently smiling, 'should I complain about that? This universally diffused, world-penetrating, conscious power of sacred will, which animates and moves the universe, as the human spirit the body that envelops it, that is divinity. I go back to the father, to the primitiv source of the spirits. But when this power within us, which we call spirit, is just as indestructible as God himself, then also his consciousness, his world-penetration, his holy will, cannot cease, whereby it even distinguishes itself from all other forces of nature and elevates itself above all, whereby it is just what it is.

"'But who may conceive a measure for the immensity of beings? Who surveys the linking of the divine powers and forces in the shoreless all of that which is? Who counts the steps of the throne of divine majesty? Ah, dear sir, our spirit floats immensely high over myriads of other beings, but to God there are new myriads above us, and we stand very low.

"'What we are, that we know; we are conscious, thinking, world and God-knowing powers, full of holy will, full of endless longing to be eternal, and with the living feeling of the personal, in itself complete independence. What we may be, that we imagin. All forces of nature remain the same; not so the spirits. These advance from experience to experience, from the noble to the nobler, from the perfect to the more perfect, and change the globe under our feet. Humanity of to-day is, through the inheritance of past ages, a more perfect one than the humanity of gray antiquity. History teaches that. In that the spirits differ from all the rest of the natural powers. What we shall be, there even the imagination is silent. Great is God; holiness and love his ruling; wonder and magnificence his realm; eternity his life. And we are in God, we are his children, we indestructible, like himself. What else is needed for our consolation?

"'Yes, I am!' said Alamontada, and he looked with quiet blessedness toward heaven; 'I am! That is sufficient for me. I am! This small word embraces eternity; for all that is is, and all that exists is eternal, because of God.'"

SOME OBSERVATIONS UPON THAT HORRIBLE AND CRUEL ORDINANCE IN DEVIL-WORSHIP, NAMELY, BLOODY SACRIFICES AND BURNT-OFFERINGS. BY THE VERY REV. EVAN DAVIES (MYFGR MORGANWG) D. D., L.L.D., ARCH DRUID OF GREAT BRITAIN.

TRANSLATED BY MORION B. C.

"See what false creeds hav brought the prejudiced and unreasoning world to. With blood and fire and superstition they hav turned it into a charnel-house." —Myfgr Morganwg.

It is surprising in this enlightened and scientific age how so many who are esteemed as thinking, educated men throughout Europe still adhere to the belief in the efficacy of atonement by sacrifice, and that this priestly imposture originated and was customary with the first human family upon the face of the earth.

It sorely puzzles these divines to account how Abel in the beginning could conceive the idea that bloody and burnt sacrifices would be a source of pleasure to the deity. They acknowledge that it is not at all consistent with nature or reason, neither does it appeal to the feelings of humanity nor to any sense of self-interest, for the slaughter and burning of useful domestic animals is contrary to these and detrimental to the owners. And as the light of nature is opposed to such an ordinance, and we cannot see that any one gifted with reasoning powers could devise such an uncouth method of worship, it follows of necessity, as they say, that it must hav been instituted by a special commandment of God himself. Verily, this uncouthness is their strongest proof that God ordained it so.

But when we know that Cain and Abel were simply the principle of good and the principle of evil incarnated (i. e., the A. wen, principle of beauty, harmony, and progress; and Avagdhu, principle of evil, death, and destruction), or humanized by the myth historians of earlier ages, this fable of Cain and Abel appears in a new light. Deity is cleared of the foul imputation, the mystery is solved and shines as a device of the corrupt and slavishly superstitious worshipers to appease the destructiv desires of the god of darkness, Avagdhu (death and winter) lest he should gobble up the offender, and not in any way intended as a sweet-smelling savor and a pleasure to the true God.

This ordinance of sacrifice was first instituted to Siva, according to the Hindoo bardism; to Chronos, say the Greeks; to Typhon (principle of evil), say the Egyptians; to Janus, or Saturn, the Scythe-bearer, say the Latins; to the God of our forefathers, by Abel, say the Jews. Thus we can trace plainly that it is the same bardic attribute (i.e., Avagdhu deified and invested with a personality) which furnishes the basis for all these deities.

Some divines think that it sprung from the example of Abraham in offering Isaac. This is not far from the truth when we consider that this fable originated in the myth of Avagdhu or Saturn sacrificing Hü (the sun-god), and it is very likely that the death of Hü as an atonement under the hand of Saturn to acquire the blessing of the new year was the primary source of this idea among the oriental nations, likewise the sacrifice of animals.

Others insist strongly that the practice of human sacrifice originated with the race of Ham. Here he is again the god of the position of darkness—in Arthan; for Ham, or Cham, is identical with the Black Jupiter, Hamon or Ammon, from Arthan (winter), humanized, and his race are simply his worshipers. Still, it is an inexplicable point to Christian divines how any one invented human sacrifices, and they cannot understand how it could please deity to receive such horrible offerings, or how any one could hope to win favor by such practices, and acknowledge with the Psalmist (cv, 37, 38) that they must hav been intended for the devil. Why a man in preference to an animal? If as an atonement or propitiation, is not a man for a man more worthy and valuable than an animal? And those who prate so much about the barbarity of human sacrifice, and teach that the heathen, who were neither orthodox nor invested with the priestly dignity, found all their offerings unavailing, yet assert that is the only way by which thir own awful Jehovah could be appeased finally, to wit, the sacrifice of a human being who was innocent and the best of mankind. Are they willing to acknowledge that if their deity is not the devil deified his attributes closely resemble him? And they who teach that their sacrament is eating the flesh and drinking the blood of that human sacrifice, which insures life eternal to the partakers of the horrible feast, are apt to be offended if we suggest that they are cannibals.

Plutarch asks: "Can human sacrifice be called adoration of any deity who could possibly be pleased with the superstitious idea that he enjoyed a feast of human flesh or could accept such an offering? Could the Typhons, or the Titans, who were the especial enemies of the gods, institute such a feast if by any possibility they were victorious?"

However early this practice existed in the orient, yet, as modern science proves, it must hav commenced thousands of years after the first appearance of man upon this planet. Inquiry also shows that the institution of sacrifice must hav been subsequent to the introduction of the sublime and pure Druidic bardism into those countries, and that only through ages of misconstruction of ideas and utter debasement could it hav culminated in this idea, later, even, than the age when the heavenly configurations were deified to be a sort of trinity in unity, and subsequent to the time when the Opposer, Avagdhu, the great chemist of nature, in conjunction with the other Arthanic figure became deified to be the supreme and omnipotent god.

It is curious in the light of bardism to study the methods and gradations by which the Druidic philosophy has been debased among the orientals, and how the zodiacal figures representing the changes of season and operations of nature are transposed and mixed. This process was carried on in the creedal system till we find Arawn or Saturn, who represents the declining autumnal sun, called also the black sun, changed to the destroyer (Avagdhu), when it simply meant the withholder of good, or negativ cessation of the sun's influence.

As the orientals were never able to distinguish between the seventh zodiacal symbol and the sun's attributes in that position, so they blended them together and consecrated them as one deity. They could not distinguish any difference between the sun's position and the sun itself. The sun ceasing to be the giver of good (W. dhu), and the regions and powers of darkness (Avagdhu) through which he traveled, or the sun changed from A. wen (beauty and harmony) to the position called, "the naked righteousness of God," symbolic of withholding his blessing, and the darkness and gloom of winter, symbolic of hell, where he was destroyed. The attributes of September, which was Seithwedh and Ion, were also confused with the wintry aspect, and all these attributes massed together to form a deity. This heterogeneous god was then constituted the god of blood atonement, i. e., the winter devil, the destroyer.

He is traceable under various names in the oriental myths—Agni, Siva, Sadi, Il, El, Hel, El Shadi, Moloch, Baal Baal Shadi or Shaddai, Chronos, Saturnus, etc., all titles of the sun.

We find after a careful research in the antiquities of the orient, especially in India, that after the diffusion of Druidic ideas the radial symbol, or Plennydh, Alawn, and Gwron, was deified as a trinity under the appellation of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, and other triads, and that a great deal of discussion arose at some very early period of the world's history, and at other times later on, to distinguish which of the trinity was the supreme one. And after many long and bloody wars the destroyer was set up as supreme in a large portion of the Eastern lands. The upright stone which represented the creativ power of the sun was debased from being the symbol of Vishnu to be the linga, symbolic of sexual energy, and was dedicated to Siva the Destroyer. References are made in the ancient Hindoo scripture to later revivals of these discussions, and traces of the three different sects still exist in Hindostan. The sect of Brahma still call themselvs Brahmans, and are the most aristocratic caste in India.

The sect of Agni or Siva affirmed that he, the terrible and unconquerable one, was the supreme one. To prove this assertion, they taught that no matter how much the other gods, Brahma and Vishnu, created and nourished, he was able to overthrow and destroy their labors. Consequently they gave him the title of Maha Deva, the Great God, and later under different appellations he was recognized as the god of war.

It was also taught by the numerous worshipers that he was destroyer, slayer, and avenger to the wicked, that he was especially to be feared, and was the deity whose wrath was to be propitiated and turned aside, for the other gods did not slay or revenge upon any one. Later they assumed it to be possible to appease the wrath of this awful being by sacrifice and to rescue the guilty ones from their doom through a substitute. "Bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh, yea, all that a man hath will he giv for his life." This idea resembles the symbolic death of Hü, who is supposed to die to appease the powers of darkness.

Sir William Jones states that the Vedas were written more than 3,350 years ago, and that they were only a fragmentary collection of the lectures and chants used in the worship of that period, and which had been handed down from a remote and unknown age by the Aryans. We find in these old Vedas fragments handed down from the time when the idea of sacrifice was only as yet in embryo.

In the commencement it was customary (according to the Vedas) to simply bind the beast to the stake as an offering to Agni, while the priest interceded for the offender, and dedicated the beast as a substitute. After it had been tied for a stated period it was loosed and allowed to escape uninjured. But in course of time, fire, the great destroyer and disintegrator of nature, was esteemed to be a more fitting symbol of this terrible deity, and it became customary to slay and burn the animal upon the horned altar, so that Siva in his fiery attribute might thus more thoroughly satisfy his lust for flesh. And the guilty sinner was more satisfied by the visible acceptance of his offering by the deity which he feared.

The higher the flames rose the greater the satisfaction, hence the priests ordained the most combustible morsels as the choicest offerings, the fat of rams, etc., while the entrails were removed and the blood spilled on the ground.

The altar was symbolic of the Kettle of Ceredwen, Anrhas, feminin attribute of the Opposer or Destroyer (i. e., crucible of nature). The womb of Anrhas as night was symbolized by a fiery furnace (see vision of Abraham), and into it Hü, with Plennydh, Alawn, and Gwron) was supposed to descend annually, to be resurrected again upon the third day, unharmed and vigorous. This is the origin of the myth of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego.

In another sense the altar signified the horned head of the Opposer, and the fire his zest in devouring the sacrifice. The beast was no longer tied to a stake but to the horns of the altar, and made a scapegoat occasionally long after the introduction of sacrifice.

This awful deity, in his attributes of Black Saturn or Arawn (Aaron, sacrificer), Destroyer from the beginning, was instituted as the cruel god of the Hebrews. He was called El, Elohim, and El Shadai, the god of Abram. In one place it is translated by the seventy as Ourana (Ouranos or Arawn). Others translate Elohim as Curses, corresponding to Avagdhu (see Parkhurst's Lexicon, p. 15), femininly Malt. In bardism, according to Calmet, Shaddai means destroyer. In Deut. xxx, 17, Shadim is translated devils, and in 2 Chron. xii, 3, Elohim is translated Beelzebub. Compare 2 Samuel, xxiv, 1, with 1 Chron. xxi, 1, and we find the god of the Jews is called Satan, and as the Jews hav mixed the principle of evil with the attributes of their deity, so we do not find a single reference to Satan in their later books, but they teach that every misfortune and evil spirit proceeded from their god.

To prove farther that Avagdhu, or the Destroyer, was the father god of the Jews, we find one of the names of the Destroyer, or Angel of the Bottomless Pit (Annoon), is Abaddon (i.e., the father of Adonai), the God Son or vicegerent of God according to the Jews. In Psalms cvi and xxxvii and Deut. xxxii, 17, it is said that the Hebrews sacrificed their children to Devils, i. e., Shadim. And in Num. xxiii, 24, and xxiv, 8, we find expressions which would seem to indicate that they were cannibals. According to Mr. Roerton the cannibals of Africa use similar language when they decide to make war upon another tribe, i. e., "We will eat our enemies; let us drink the blood of our neighboring tribe."

Now as Elohim of the Jews meant simply the sun in the winter solstice, how is it that they hav confused him with the powers of darkness? "If I am Elohim where is my terror?" (Mal. l. 60.) Dr. Adam Clarke compares Elohim with Pluto and asserts that his worship originated in the slavish terror of superstition.

Voltaire in the Bastille.

EXTRACT FROM JAMES PARTON'S LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

"Monsieur Arouet," said the regent, "I bet I will make you see something you hav never seen!"

"Indeed, and what is it, Monseigneur?"

"The Bastille," replied the regent.

"Ah, Monseigneur," said the poet, "I consider it seen!"

The next morning, Saturday, May 16, Arouet, not so early a riser as the czar, was roused from sleep at his lodgings, at the sign of the Green Basket, by a strange noise on the stairs. Arrests upon lettres de cachet were made with the utmost suavity of manner, but with a considerable show of force; and half a dozen men cannot ascend a staircase without waking a sleeping poet. Upon opening his eyes he saw the crowd at the foot of his bed, one of whom drew near, touched him upon the shoulder with a white wand, and with all possible politeness explained their business; perhaps handing him a slip of paper, on which it was briefly stated:

"The intention of His Royal Highness is that the Sieur Arouet be arrested and conducted to the Bastille."

He was allowed, it seems, to go to his dressing-room, and, while he and his valet were getting on their clothes, one of the officers sealed up his papers, and another took an inventory of his effects. It so chanced that the spy Beauregard, who had given the information upon which the arrest was made, "found himself present" on this occasion, also, and had further conversation with the unsuspecting victim.

"Why are you arrested?" he asked.

"I know nothing about it," the prisoner replied.

"My opinion is," said the spy, "that your writings are the cause."

"There are no proofs that I hav written anything, for I hav never confided my writings to any but true friends."

"Is there nothing in these papers to convict you?"

"No; for, luckily, the exempt did not get hold o the pair of breeches in which there were some verses and songs. I seized an opportunity, while I was dressing, to throw them where—it won't be easy to find them."

So reports the spy, and it is possible some conversation resembling this occurred. The place indicated was searched, to the extreme discomfiture of the inmates of the Green Basket, and to the spoiling of several barrels of beer in its cellar; but no scrap of offensiv writing was found. He was permitted to take with him no article whatever except the clothes he wore; but before leaving he managed to dash upon paper and send (probably by his valet) a short note to the Duke of Sully, who had so happily alleviated his late exile:

"M. de Basin, lieutenant of the short robe, is here to arrest me this morning. I can tell you nothing more about it. I know not what I am accused of. My innocence assures me of your protection. I shall be too happy if you do me the honor to accord it to me."

"Who goes there?" cries the nearest sentinel.

"Command of the king," replies the sergeant of the escort.

An officer of the guard appears, to whom the lettre de cachet is shown; upon seeing which he strikes a bell to summon the officials of the château, and permits the whole cortege to enter the first inclosure. The guard turns out; the officials stand ready; the the coach comes to a stand. The lieutenant of the king opens the door of the carriage. Every soldier covers his face with his hat, so as not to see the prisoner, and if by chance there is some one in the court who has no hat on he turns his back, or instantly withdraws. The prisoner alights. He is the king's guest; this is one of the royal châteaux; and he is conducted with the utmost respect to the office of the governor, who givs a receipt to the commander of the escort, and presents him to officers of his own. They conduct the prisoner into the next room, where he is respectfully but thoroughly searched, deprived of every article he possesses which does not strictly belong to his apparel, and an inventory is taken.

He was obliged, as we hav seen, to surrender at least one letter from his Olimpe, then an unhappy Baroness de Winterfield; he a less unhappy prisoner of state. A good pocketful of money was found upon him: "six louis of gold" and a dozen or more of other coins, besides "an eye-glass, a pair of scissors, a bunch of keys, tablets, and some papers." After he has signed the inventory, he is taken back to the governor's room, where he is formally handed over to the officers of the Bastille.

The draw-bridge falls; he is led across it; he enters the grand inclosure; the gate closes; he is in the Bastille. Under-officers show him to an eight-sided room in one of the towers, shut the door upon him, turn the huge key, drive home the bolts, and leave him to his reflections, with ten feet of solid and ancient masonry between him and the bright May-day world of Paris.

The bird is literally caged at last. His cage is of eight stone sides and a vaulted roof, furnished with a plain table, two rush-bottomed chairs, and a narrow bed. His family, as we are told by Duvernet, was in desolation.

"I foresaw clearly enough," cried his much-enduring father, "that his idleness would lead to some disgrace. Why did he not go into a profession?"

His Jansenist of a brother probably added a hearty served-him-right, to his father's I-told-you-so. The old Marquis de Dangeau made another entry in his diary concerning this young man: "Arouet has been put into the Bastille. He is a young poet accused of writing very imprudent verses. He was exiled some months ago. He seems incorrigible." St. Simon apologizes to himself for recording so trivial a circumstance: "I should not mention here that Arouet was put into the Bastille for writing some most audacious verses but for the celebrity which his poems, his adventures, and the caprice of the public hav given him since. He is the son of my father's notary, whom I hav often seen bringing papers to sign. He could never do anything with that libertin son of his, whose very libertinage made his fortune at last under the name of Voltaire, which he assumed to hide his own." Thus Polonius upon this plebeian Laertes.

Meanwhile, Laertes, as usual with him in all circumstances, was making himself as comfortable as possible. He was arrested on Saturday morning. On Thursday following we find him signing a receipt for certain articles needful to complete the equipment of a young gentleman and scholar, namely, "two volumes of Homer, Latin-Greek, two India handkerchiefs, a little cap, two cravats, a night-cap, a small bottle of essence of cloves." Other effects had doubtless preceded this small convoy, and he could send for more if the articles were not prohibited. It is not certain that he was the sole occupant of his room, for others of the Duchess du Maine's partisans were arrested about the same time, and the château may hav been overfull. Be that as it may, there he was, with his Homer, his night-cap, and his small bottle of essence of cloves, a prisoner in one of the massiv towers of the old Bastille, with a deep slit for a window, through which neither earth nor sky could be seen.

Anti-Comstock Legislation.

It will be borne in mind that a bill in the interest of Anthony Comstock, giving him greatly increased power, to the extent of superseding the police of this city, was, during the past winter, introduced into the Legislature by Mr. Waring, of Kings county. Comstock spent a good deal of time at Albany, buttonholing the members of the legislature, showing them his filthy collection of indecent pictures, and impressing them with his immense piety and purity, using his entire energy to secure the passage of his bill. He succeeded in hoodwinking and wheedling several impressible members, and at one time it was feared his bill might pass and become a law; but, thanks to the able efforts of Mr. T. B. Wakeman, who was sent by the National Defense Association to make an argument before the legislativ committee to whom the bill was referred, the eyes of several of the legislators were opened, the bill was defeated, and Comstock was signally rebuked.

Not far from the time when the Comstock bill was placed before the legislature Col. M. C. Murphy of this city, introduced before the same body the following anti-Comstock bill:

SEC. 1.—In all the courts of this state whenever it shall appear on the trial of a person charged with having violated a penal statute that he was assisted in the alleged violation or induced or inveigled to violate such penal statute by some person acting or claiming to act in the capacity of agent, informer, or spy for any society or association, or for any individual who is not a prosecuting officer under the laws of this state, the testimony of such person so acting or claiming to act as agent, informer, or spy, and also that of every other person acting in conjunction with him, shall not be received in evidence.

SEC. 2.—All inconsistent acts are repealed.

This bill, if once a law, practically blocks the infamous Comstock's game, destroys his favorit course of procedure, and repeals a large share of the acts which he has heretofore induced the legislature to pass for his pleasure and benefit. It is well known that Comstock has over and over again selected his victims on whom he has determined to exercise his wiles, and by deception, falsehood, and the most artful representations has inveigled, seduced, and decoyed persons to violate the enactments of his procuring, and then he has arrested them, dragged them into court, and with his own unsupported testimony, which has often been simply perjury, he has sent them to prison for a term of years and thus brought utter ruin upon them and their families. This has been Comstockism, this has been the high moral work which Samuel Colgate and many of the clergy and the foremost members of the churches hav sustained and defended.

Col. Murphy's bill puts an end to all this. Where a trap has been set and a plot worked up to induce a person to commit an offense for the sake of the conviction and imprisonment, the plotter, the seducer, the decoyer, the inveigler, the informer, and the perjurer shall not longer hav the power to send his victim to prison; his testimony shall not be sufficient to secure conviction. This practically ends Comstockism so far as our state courts are concerned, for Col. Murphy's Anti-Spy bill has become a law. The Assembly first enacted it, and on the 17th inst., despite Comstock's persistent efforts, despite all the Christian influence he was able to bring to bear, despite the almighty potency of his foul smut-bag of filth and indecency, the Senate passed the bill by the overwhelming vote of 19 to 6. The Sun, on the 18th, gave the following report of this last struggle:

The Senate continued the discussion on the bill to prevent spies of the Anthony Comstock order from testifying in the courts—the pending question being on Mr. Mills's amendment that testimony of these men should not be excluded unless it appeared that the law would not hav been violated except for the inveiglement of these spies and informers. Mr. Mills made a long argument in favor of his amendment, and gave a detailed history of the work of one of these voluntary associations in suppressing lottery gambling. Mr. Fowler said that if any of the agents of this society were engaged in the business of inveigling men into the commission of crime, this bill would affect them seriously; but if they were only pursuing the legitimate business of trying to suppress crime in a legitimate way the bill would not affect them. Mr. Hogan said that unless lobbying on this bill were stopped he should call for the enforcement of the rule. (Anthony Comstock had just been talking with Senator Mills.)

Mr. Mills said so far as he was concerned there had been no lobbying, but simply asking and answering questions.

Mr. Hogan said he referred to lobbying against the bill that had been going on around the hotels and elsewhere in Albany for several days past. After some further remarks by Mr. Mills in favor of his amendment, it was put to vote and lost—yeas, 6; nays, 18. Mills then offered another amendment that the bill should not apply to any case where the party complained of is engaged in any business in violation of law. This was lost by 7 to 12. The bill was then put on its final passage and passed by a vote of 19 to 6, as follows:

Yeas—Astor, Baker, Birdsall, Bixby, Braman, Eidman, Fowler, Hogan, Jacobs, Lord, Madden, McCarthy, Robertson, Rockwell, Seebacher, Sessions, Stevens, Strahan, Wagner—19.

Nays—Davenport, Halbert, Loomis, Mills, Williams, Woodin—6.

Truth has the following:

After the third severe tussle in the Senate over Colonel Murphy's Anti-Spy bill, the discussion over which was participated in by Mills, Fowler, and Woodin, the bill passed, 19 to 6, and it goes to the governor.

Colonal Murphy is entitled to great credit for the untiring zeal, vigilance, and devotion which he has brought to bear to pass this measure. This defeat of Comstock is severely felt, and the society, it is said, will bring all its guns to bear on Governor Cornell to secure a veto.

Of course the infamous spy, intriguer, and informer, Comstock, feels greatly chagrined, snubbed, and defeated. His power is largely taken from him, and his ability to send people to prison greatly lessened. But his only chance now is to work upon the governor. He will again visit Albany backed with the strong remonstrances and appeals of Howard Crosby, Parson Newman, the Rev. John Hall, the Rev. Frederick Courtney, and holy men of that class. Samuel Colgate's money will flow freely. That omnipresent smut-bag, containing the choicest specimens from Comstock's filthy Nassau street museum, will be exhibited gratis to the governor; but whether all these will be potent enough to sway Gov. Cornell and induce him to veto Col. Murphy's bill, which has been enacted by both branches of the legislature, remains to be seen. True men and good men will hope that the governor will confirm by his signature what the legislature had done. If he does not it will be well understood that Christian influence and Christian money hav prevented it.

In its issue of the 21st Truth prints the following:

The people of New York hav every reason to be grateful to Assemblyman Michael C. Murphy for the Anti-Spy bill which he succeeded in getting passed last week in both houses by such a splendid majority. The masses do not realize the social slavery to which they would hav been subjected had they possessed a less determined champion than Mr. Murphy in the Assembly, and had the schemes of the church and of the private spy societies, helped on by Tony Comstock and Waring of Brooklyn succeeded instead. Their object was nothing less than to hav made of the district attorney's and sheriff's offices, a tender to the schemes of private spies, and possibly of blackmailers. What Comstock and his myrmidons would hav ordered the district attorney, the sheriff, and even the police judges would hav been compelled to carry out, under constant threat of impeachment.

It is absurd to say that any man but a sworn officer of the law could or should institute and carry out criminal prosecutions against private citizens. However pure, however disinterested a man may be, exercising such functions as those Tony Comstock sought to seize, it is impossible but that persecution should, sooner or later, creep into his work. Comstock himself, from beginning well several years ago in the extirpation of obscene literature, gradually sought to giv his weight to other schemes, some of them as cruel and wanton as any that can be imagined. From such beginnings grew the famous, or, more properly, the infamous black list of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, where respectable private citizens figured who were threatened with domestic exposure. No man in this community desires to feel a secret, impalpable, spy system weighing on him every hour of the day and night, following his every movement, and threatening to expose his very conversations.

The suspicion of wrong-doing is the very next thing to doing the wrong itself. We are not in Russia here, and we hav no call for the Russian method of procedure. We already hav given far too much power to private societies arrogating to themselvs public functions. Even so good and honest a man as Mr. Bergh has not always known where to stop in his prosecutions carried on by authority of a special statute which created his Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Then came the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which, while founded on a humane idea, has not always acted wisely or too well. And there followed two societies, the results of which hav been of doubtful benefit from the first—those for the Suppression of Vice and the Prevention of Crime. Certain it is that vice has not been suppressed or crime prevented. The few individual prosecutions that hav taken place hav not affected the general aggregate of vice and crime in the slightest, while several cases of persecution hav taken place, such as the prosecutions of Foote and Bennett, that no argument of good motiv can excuse.

On the other hand, Assemblyman Murphy, opposing increased legislation for these societies at all times, has presented and successfully pushed a bill to a passage which will seriously curtail the power of Comstock and his kind to annoy. Under its provisions private detectivs belonging to private societies are incompetent to giv testimony in criminal cases unless called in to do so by the district attorney. In other words, the sworn public prosecutor is made the judge of whether the cases pushed by these private spies are conceived in malice and bigotry, or whether they tend to the public good. There is nothing in the bill to prohibit Comstock, for instance, from doing good. But he will no longer be able to dictate to private citizens how they shall conduct their business.

This is not the first good thing that Mr. Murphy has done. Ten years ago he was the most determined opponent in the Assembly of the nefarious schemes of Tweed. Sweeny, et. al., and he suffered through opposing them when many wealthier men yielded to the blandishments they put forth.

It has been intimated that Governor Cornell may veto the Anti-Spy bill, because Comstock and his crowd will bring all their power to bear on him The majority by which the bill passed should be enough to prove to Governor Cornell that this would be an unwise thing to do. The majority was quite large enough to pass it over his veto.

But a measure of such unquestionable wisdom will, we are confident, not be tampered with by the Governor. Such a course would only lend it additional importance, and at the same time array against him a vast Liberal element.

More Work of the Vampire of Death.

The late Joseph Sabin, who departed this life in Brooklyn some three weeks ago, was a very worthy man. He was believed to be the most thoroughly informed book man in the world. His whole life had been spent in the handling, reading, and selling of books. The Dictionary of Books upon which he was engaged almost up to the hour of his death is described as being the greatest work of the kind ever undertaken. He was, indeed, a most genial, friendly, and industrious man, a man with many warm friends.

It is believed by those who were most intimate with Mr. Sabin during the last two years of his life that his death was hastened and his peace of mind greatly disturbed by the machinations and persecutions of Anthony Comstock. The detestable meddler, spy, and intriguer threw a dark shadow over the family of Mr. Sabin. He plotted against the young Mr. Sabin, unjustly secured his arrest upon a foul charge, and drove him from friends and home.

No one really knows what it is to be arrested by Anthony Comstock upon the crushing charge of obscenity save those who hav had the bitter experience to pass through. No other can realize the stigma, the odium, the disgrace that is thus inevitably cast upon the one arrested and upon his family. The expense, anxiety, uncertainty, and disgrace attendant upon the defense of a charge of obscenity is greater than any one can realize who has not passed through the terrible experience. And the subsequent sentence and imprisonment cannot be adequately described. They hav to be experienced to be fully realized. The deep and acute trouble and grief thrown upon the family of a man so persecuted can never be known but by those who hav drank of the bitter cup.

There is little doubt that the days of Joseph Sabin were shortened by the cruel and heartless persecutions of Anthony Comstock. This foul blot upon humanity has boasted that he has driven fifteen persons to suicide. The days of many others hav been shortened by his machinations, and the lives of many scores hav been made absolutely wretched by his villainy and malignity.

The writer of these lines has witnessed the dying moments of a good man—a victim to the wiles and persecutions of this vile Anthony Comstock. But for the persistent and atrocious conduct of this infernal vampire, Dr. Joseph Bott undoubtedly would be alive and well to-day. The sorrow, grief, and utter wretchedness which this infamous man has caused is known to none save the recording angel, if there is such a personage in the upper world.

Comstock may now add the name of Joseph Sabin to his long list of victims whom he has sent to untimely and unhappy graves. Let him exult in his fiendish vengeance and hate.

But Joseph Sabin left many appreciativ friends behind him—men who understood his worth and the wrongs that were done him. Many of these friends attended the last rites bestowed upon the departed.

Robert Colyer did himself great honor in attending to the last ceremonies of his friend Sabin. He did an honor to himself and humanity when he pronounced kind and truthful words of the departed, in words something like these:

Our departed friend had a great amount of knowledge from books, with which he was, perhaps, more thoroughly acquainted than any man living; but he did not pretend to know very much about God. In this direction he set up no claims as to knowledge, but as to real goodness and in kindness toward his fellow-men few were before him. I do not know very much about these things, and I may be mistaken in my estimates and opinions, but in my heart I believe that in the great day of reckoning, when the angel of justice accords to each individual the award due him, he will speak far more kindly to brother Sabin and will judge him far less harshly than many who profess more righteousness and lay greater claims to theological virtue—than those, indeed, who hav wronged him.

The following interesting chapter of facts is from the Boston Globe of the 18th inst.

CRUEL PERSECUTION.—THE KIND OF WORK THAT COMSTOCK GLORIES IN AND IS GLORIFIED FOR.

Columns of interesting reminiscences were printed in the New York dailies recently on the occasion of the death of the famous bibliopole, Joseph Sabin, and the universal opiuion was that his character was entirely above reproach and his life one of great service to his fellows. The sudden breakdown in health which carried him off while engaged on the chief work of his life is attributed by the New York correspondent of a Western paper to the persecution of his son William, an educated young man, by Anthony Comstock upon a technical violation of the law under which Comstock acts. Among the invoices of old books and pictures that come to New York from Europe are many engravings that fall under the ban of the statute. They are bought at auction in London and Paris by agents, who, without attempting to assort the good and reject the bad, box all up together and ship them to New York. It has for a long time been the custom in Sabin's store to pack up these objectionable engravings and not to offer them for sale or put them on view. The pictures were generally reproductions of old carvings of the middle ages, or curiosities of blasphemy. A few book collectors, including church deacons and gentlemen of high position, were purchasers of rare engravings of this character, and now and then one was sold to them; but the law was no more transgressed than nearly every publishing house violates it by supplying certain customers with French works.

Comstock was put on the scent of these engravings by a clerk who, having robbed Sabin, had decamped with about $10,000 worth of engravings. This clerk reappeared in New York and opened an establishment up town. To check the industry of his old employer, which he was conscious was at work to prosecute him, he adroitly put Comstock in possession of data about the engravings, their titles, where they were kept, etc., and thus arranged to secure his own immunity by engaging his adversary with a powerful antagonist. Comstock at first sent a boy, who was booted out of the store with this parting advice, to tell those who had sent him to put him into better business. A few days later a man came in and, affecting familiarity with classical engravings, asked to see some. He was told that the house had none to sell. He pretended that he was making a collection of them, and was willing to pay well for such as he wanted. He named over some engravings that he desired, such as one called "The Rock of Ages," and another, "The Long Meter Doxology," both curious works of blasphemy. He pulled out a big roll of bills and said that he was prepared to pay cash, that he knew they had such pictures, and he might as well hav them as any one else, and intimated that he could get them elsewhere.

He was told by William Sabin, a young and inexperienced man, that the rule of the house was not to sell such pictures. The man, however, was so persistent that at length some engravings were shown him, and, as he seemed determined to make a bargain, young Sabin, thinking to get rid of him by naming a high price, fixed a certain value upon them. The man quickly purchased them, paid over the money, watched a still younger member of the family receive the money, and he, taking his evidence, hurried back to Comstock. The result was the arrest of William Sabin, his indictment, and the indictment of his young brother Robert. Comstock then raided the store, broke open a locked drawer, and confiscated a lot of pictures which the law he himself drew condemns. He boasted that he had brought down big game, and pursued young Sabin so relentlessly that the latter, feeling that because of a technical violation of the law he might be sent to prison, and thus forever disgrace his young wife and children, determined to evade such a fate by forfeiting his bond, and accordingly stepped on board of an out-going steamer one day, and Comstock next heard of him in Europe. The loss of the comfort and association of his son weighed heavily upon Mr. Sabin, and the trouble stole in upon his sleep and repose, and hastened his decay.

In an editorial entitled, "A Blow at Professional Spies," the same paper says:

In the lucid intervals that now and then occur in the course of the senatorial squabble at Albany, the legislature of the state of New York is getting in some good work. The Senate on Friday, by a vote of 19 to 6, passed a bill that had already received the sanction of the Assembly, and needs but the Governor's signature to become a law, which will go far to secure innocent people against the danger of being decoyed into prison through the devilish ingenuity of some professional blackmailer or sneaking spy.

The measure provides that the testimony of any agent, informer, or spy acting for any society, or for any individual not a prosecuting officer, who has induced or inveigled any one to violate a penal statute, shall not be received in court as evidence against the accused, nor that of any person acting in conjunction with such agent, informer, or spy. It is needless to add that it is aimed at the notorious Anthony Comstock and his decoy-duck and partner, Mr. Joseph Britton, who, abusing the powers granted them by the government, make it their business to seduce honest men by tempting them in their poverty into the commission of crime, and boast of the number of persons whom they hav driven to suicide and early graves.

A fair sample of their dastardly deeds is described in another column in an article headed "Cruel Persecution," which illustrates the method by which Joseph Sabin, one of New York's most reputable, useful, and honorable citizens, was worried to death before he had half finished the most important work of his life. There is evidence now on the court records of this country that renders Anthony Comstock as fit a candidate for state prison as any man whom he ever sent there. Evidently such a bill as that just passed is calculated to seriously cripple him; so he has been lobbying against its passage with all his might and with that of all his backers, and with an intrusiveness that has called forth public protests from members of the legislature in open session. But all to no purpose. In the face of the opposition of a few country members over whose eyes Mr. Comstock has succeeded in pulling the wool, and by the activ work of Messrs. Murphy and Andrews, two Democratic assemblymen from New York city, the bill has been passed through by a large majority of both houses, and the tremendous efforts that will undoubtedly be brought to bear on Governor Cornell to secure a veto will probably fail.

So far so good. "Scar-faced Tony" has been stripped of a portion of his power. But much remains to be done. By far the greater portion of his mischief has been achieved in the United States courts, where his power largely depends upon the judge who happens to be presiding at the time. Let Congress follow the example of the New York legislature, confining the power to suppress vice by law to the officials appointed ordiuarly for that purpose. When Mr. Comstock is left to suppress vice by persuasion and education the business will become unprofitable, and we predict that he will speedily retire from it.

Camp-Meeting.

The Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists will hold their next annual camp-meeting on the north bank of Gaguac Lake, Battle Creek, Michigan, commencing August 12th, and closing August 22, 1881. Some of the most talented speakers in the West are engaged, and others will be added in due time, of which I will speak later.

Gaguac Lake is a beautiful sheet of water just outside the city limit of Battle Creek, carrying upon its bosom two steamboats and several sailing crafts, to amuse and benefit the pleasure-seeker. Come, friends, from far and near. Let us hav heaven here and now. L. S. BURDICK, Pres.

Parton's Life of Voltaire.

I.—THE BASTILLE.

"Truth is stranger than fiction." "Interesting as a novel" is a phrase that givs but a faint notion of the delight with which the eye follows the pages of this enchanting work. "It is a store-house of fascinations," says the last critic. The picture, quiet and simple at first, changes like a transformation scene, and is continued as an ever-varying panorama until it ends in triumph at the Pantheon. In many respects the most remarkable of Frenchmen and of human beings, it is certain that no human being other than Voltaire ever led such a life—so diversified, so inwoven with the events, actors, characters, and the very life of his age. Every chapter is a new scene of a play with new actors, and an absorbing interest in their fate.

Every passion, hope, and interest of human nature, every variety of circumstances in which they could be illustrated, every peculiarity of individual life, in station, sex, or character, pass before the eye, till romance only seems to be the author's object, and we are astonished to reflect that it is true. Its strength, as well as its beauty and interest, after all, is in its truth. We believe this to be the only life of Voltaire extant that is truthful and intelligible. It is the only one written from the human point of view—a view high enough to oversee the life and motivs of this wonderful man so as to do justice to him, to his friends and foes, and to the influences he and they represented.

In this latter respect this biography is noteworthy. It opens a new era in the judgment of human character. Let us notice this change particularly. Hitherto biographies hav been written mainly by those who were below the man whose life was written, and who looked up to him with gratitude and veneration; or else by those who were on the same general level with him, and for the purpose of illustrating and extending his influences, of which the author was also an exponent. Of the first, or the up-looking biographies, Boswell's Life of Johnson is the finest specimen. Of the second, the most numerous of all, we may take as instances White's Life of Swedenborg, or the lives of the leaders of remarkable religious or political movements, written by their co-religionists or partisans. Mr. Parton has founded a new school of biography, very different from these.

This Life of Voltaire is the finest fruit of a new growth of human sentiment. It is the largest and completest attempt ever made to solve and estimate individual life from the purely historical—that is, the humanity—point of view. It differs from other biographies in that the author, from the hight to which the progress of the race has borne him, as an impartial spectator, overlooks and so traces the strivings and motivs of his hero truthfully, and estimates them as they really served the highest and best human interests. From this point of view most of the former lives and estimates of Voltaire appear to be, as they are, grotesque distortions of the man and of his motivs and acts, seen through the misty air of religious and political prejudice.

For the first time, because seen from this higher point of view, this man has been brought out into the clear sunlight of the human judgment day. No folly or fault is concealed, or excused in a partisan spirit. His story is simply told and judged, and the verdict is that Voltaire must ever remain in the Pantheon of the human race as one of its chiefest servants. And the reason is that

> "For all human failings
> The love and service of Man atones."

Voltaire's faults, failings, and weaknesses are patent enough, but when the balance comes to be struck he remains one of the greatest benefactors of mankind that ever lived. He made an era in the life of the collectiv Man. Modern life and thought began with him. Behind him lie the dark middle ages, and from them he was our deliverer. How can we ever repay our debt of gratitude?

How can we ever cease to wonder, too, at the way in which it was accomplished? By one man, single-handed, with no weapon but his pen! He had to fight fire with fire, falsehood with falsehood, duplicity with a deeper cunning. As a result the systems of falsehood and oppression consolidated by ages were left by him so riddled that we hav only the burden of removing their debris as we place in their stead liberty, science, and humanity.

He was really the victor in his life-long contest with the powers of darkness. Why and how? This biography for the first time fairly answers. It shows that the main, the great and absorbing motiv and faith of Voltaire was faith in human nature and a desire to ennoble and advance his fellow-man to the uttermost. At bottom he was a good man.

When his royal Frederick kept writing to him in substance that the mass of humankind were only food for powder—so many animals, half monkey and half tiger, Voltaire kept replying, Yes, but between the monkey and the tiger there is the Man!

Such words, and the miraculous activity and zeal with which he sustained them, will preserve his fame as a precious jewel, shining forever through the depths of the ages. In time and position he stands between, and is the only man of modern times to be ranked with Shakspere and Goethe, making together the grand triumvirate, English, French, and German, the three great emancipators of the human soul.

Every chapter of this life-panorama has its importance, but we would place particular emphasis upon three, as the beginning, middle, and end of the great contest: 1. The Bastille; 2. The Encyclopedia; 3. The Pantheon. The latter two of these topics we shall refer to in the future. For this occasion we giv in another column extracts illustrating Voltaire's introduction to the Bastille. He had two terms of residence there. The first in 1717, of eleven months, and another of fifteen days in 1726, just prior to his exile to England.

In both cases his imprisonment was an outrage.

The first grew out of some political writings that were erroneously supposed to be his. The second was the result of his efforts to get something like justice executed upon Chevalier de Rohan for causing him to be publicly insulted and beaten. This last indignity, and the utter impossibility of procuring reparation, entered like an iron into the very soul of Voltaire—an iron which was grown over, but never withdrawn.

The Bastille was placed before the mind and in the heart of the young Voltaire, as in fact it was the embodiment of the outrage of church and state united in one irresponsible personal government, merely to execute the interests and iniquities of superstition or of a debased and selfish nobility. It represented the enormities and abuses of the feudal system which had been outgrown, the methods and even forms of which were fast becoming intolerable to human nature.

The mass of the French people finally came to look upon it in a similar light. It was to them, as to Voltaire, the symbol of L'Infame!—The Infamous—and to be crushed by any and all means.

Not without reason, therefore, has the French republic fixed upon the date of its destruction as the decisiv and most glorious event of their great Revolution. They hav made that date (July 14, 1789) their national holiday, corresponding to our Fourth of July. The lettre de cachet which placed the young Voltaire within its walls was the first of the chain of events that insured their final destruction. How this resulted our next article will show.

In the mean time we hope that our readers will hasten to become acquainted with the work itself. The two volumes at first may seem to be large, but no one who begins to read will regret their length. Our friend, Hon. Elizur Wright, had only "devoured" two hundred pages when he wrote to the author his thanks that one thousand pages more of the intensely interesting and instructiv narrativ remained. He expressed the feeling of every one who will take the book in hand. T. B. W.

Mr. Bradlaugh's Paper,

The National Reformer, for June 12th contains the following from Mr. Bradlaugh:

"Northampton is as hearty and as determined as it is possible to be in this great struggle. While willing to wait a reasonable time, so that the government may not be hindered or embarrassed in their carriage of the Irish Land bill, the voters who elected me will not wait one moment, even for the government, if their just claims are slighted or disregarded. The men and women of Northampton—to whom, should they desire it, I would instantly resign the honor they hav conferred upon me—tell me that their confidence in me is unabated, and that, if need be, they will return me again and again. My duty is clear; I shall fight as best I can, rousing public opinion as completely as I am able."

"Having the fullest faith that the government intend to try to carry an Affirmation bill, it is my intention to do nothing which may render such proposed legislation more difficult. But as the law as it stands at present givs me the right to take my seat I must, if the government proposal be rejected or obstructed, insist on performing the duties of the position to which my constituents hav elected me."

A paragraph in another part of the paper, showing the agitation which is being kept up, says:

"Resolutions in support of Mr. Bradlaugh's right to take his seat hav been passed during the week in Tunbridge Wells, Hyde (at the largest out-door meeting ever held there), Margate (Working Men's Liberal Association), Eleusis Club, Chelsea, the Political Committee of the Four Clubs, the Birmingham 800, Bradford Liberal Electoral Association, Bury, Rochdale, Pontefract, Kettering, East London, West Bromwich, Dudley, Accrington, Chelsea, Hackney."

As an instance of a rational view taken of Mr. Bradlaugh's case on the part of a Congregational clergyman, the following is copied from the same issue of the Reformer:

"A 'London Congregational Minister' has addressed the following letter, with his name attached, to A. H. Guinness, Esq., in reply to a printed circular from that gentleman requesting him to announce to his congregation a meeting in Exeter Hall to oppose Mr. Bradlaugh's admission to Parliament, and also requesting that a poster to the same effect should be placed on the chapel notice-board:

DEAR SIR: You invite me to display on the notice-board of my chapel a bill headed, "Is England to Remain a Christian Kingdom?" You also invite me to help you to answer this question by taking part in an effort to keep Mr. Bradlaugh out of the seat to which he has been legally elected.

As a Christian minister, I solemnly decline to be a party to your proceedings. I cannot admit that England is "a Christian kingdom" so long as a majority of its people are unconverted to God. Nor is there much hope of the masses of the people being brought to God while you and your friends, and many others, are willing to inflict the most vexatious injustice upon a citizen in the name of our holy Christian religion. Do you suppose that the Lord Jesus Christ can gain anything from the course now being pursued against Mr. Bradlaugh?

First, he prefers and claims to affirm, and he is allowed to affirm subject to the statute. Then the Christian party set the common informer to work, and they obtain a decision to the effect that Mr. Bradlaugh cannot affirm, but must take the oath. And now, having nullified the affirmation which Mr. Bradlaugh conscientiously preferred, and driven him either to take the oath or certainly be unseated, the same people combine to prevent him taking the oath—which they had but just persecuted him for not taking!

Under these circumstances, and in deference to those who consider that an Atheist would, by swearing, profane the oath, the government attempt to bring in a bill to prevent such profanation by enabling any member to affirm at his option. But the Christian party oppose this bill, and hinder its introduction by every device of obstructiv tactics.

I confess to a feeling of shame to see Christian men acting so crookedly in the name of him who prayed the father to forgiv his enemies, and never used force and duplicity to despoil them of natural or civil right.

Gloomy, indeed, are the prospects of the gospel in this kingdom, if this is how we treat men; if our religion can impel us to no nobler course toward the unbeliever and the rebellious. But I refuse to believe that anything like a majority of Christian people desire this to be done. They would rather act toward Mr. Bradlaugh in the just and kindly spirit of Mr. John Bright, who, by the noble words he has used in Parliament, has done more to giv the Atheist a glimpse of the heart of Christ than the whole of the opposing party.

Do, my dear sir, desist from this course! It is hard enough already to get the thoughtful working classes to hear the gospel. The difficulty will be insuperable for many long years if the policy of Christians is not more worthy and just than I venture to think yours is in the present instance.

Will you please read this letter to your committee, if you care to do so. Yours truly,

A LONDON CONGREGATIONAL MINISTER.

Liberal League Notice.

FRIENDS OF LIBERALISM IN ILLINOIS: The organization of the state Liberal League of Illinois is now completed and ready for work. The officers elected at the convention in Farmer City for the ensuing year are, W. H. Pearce, of Camargo, Pres.; F. F. Follet, of Rockford, Ill., Sec.; and M. B. Lawrence, of Duquoin, Treas.

Mrs. M. V. Hall, of St. John League, Perry county, Ill., will relieve me somewhat by furnishing a full report of the Farmer City convention for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers.

By a vote of the League I am instructed to solicit additional accessions to our membership—at a life membership fee of one dollar each—deeming it better to have five members at one dollar each than one member for the same amount. It is your help and coöperation we want more than your money. We hav now fifty-one members, and we would like to multiply that by ten as soon as we possibly can.

Brother and sister Liberals in Illinois, by organizing the state Liberal League of Illinois we hav lighted a beacon in the Prairie state never to be extinguished until universal mental liberty is established in this nation. Will you help us diffuse its reflecting rays? If you will, please let me know. Address me either at Springfield, Ill., or Rockford, Ill. All letters directed to me will reach me from either place.

Yours for universal mental liberty,

F. F. FOLLET, Sec. Ill. State L. L.

Clinton, Ill., June 15, 1881.

THE July number of the North American Review bears the usual characteristic of timeliness. Carl Shurz leads off with a suggestiv paper on "Present Aspects of the Indian Problem," in which he discusses the Indian obstacle in the way of the country's development, the harmonizing of the habits, occupations, and interests of the red men, the necessity of educating their youth, the making of the men themselvs small land proprietors, and the offering of inducements to them to sell for a fair compensation the lands they do not cultivate. Next a caustic writer givs the views of "A Yankee Farmer" on "The Religious Conflicts of the Age." Another trenchant article is "The Power of Public Plunder," by James Parton, which appeals to the sons of our men of character and wealth, on patriotic grounds, to enter into politics, and become the safeguards of their country against rings and bosses. Mr. Henry George dwells on "The Common Sense of Taxation."

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Eighteenth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You are using the reductio ad absurdum method with your cause certainly. "If God," you say, "is not substance, not something that can be found or produced, then he is nothing and has no existence." Is this an axiom in the school of advanced (!) thought—a specimen of that relentless logic which is the boast of modern unbelief? Even the unanswerable arguments, as you have termed them, of Thomas Paine would fail before this resistless logic. Incomparable in everything else, the man who wrote that Atheism was "a scandal to human nature" must, after all, be classed with the "ninnies" who believe in the existence of God.

I did not suppose that you could exhibit such solemn imbecility in the way of argument. Are you not aware, too, that none of those who are authorities in Positivism would uphold your dogmatical denial of the existence of a deity? I do not except even Prof. Tyndall. I do not contend, of course, that he holds the Christian conception of God, but he would reject your views as supreme folly; he is rather one of those model scientists who, according to his definition, "have as little fellowship with the Atheist who says there is no God as with the Theist who professes to know the will of God." Professor Huxley, Herbert Spencer, and Charles Darwin, all unite in the same confession. I do not claim for myself any but a superficial acquaintance with the views of scientists; but to see those who define themselves as disciples of science and claim its discoveries and theories as their body of divinity shoot wildly ahead of their teachers and masters is a very amusing spectacle.

Do you call mind substance? Surely you will not defend such sophism. That there is a something which thinks, feels, wills, a something apart from and dissimilar to matter, is recognized universally. This is mind. That there is a contrary to this something which neither thinks nor feels nor wills, but which has form, density, divisability, etc., is also borne witness to by the same universal consciousness. This distinction between mind and matter is radical and real; no one can deny it without becoming a sophist, yet mind is not a substance, and can no more be found or produced than can God.

In the argument I attempted to sketch, proving the existence of God, I did not assert his identity with Jehovah. There is therefore no call for nor strength in your assertion that the argument as much proves the existence of Jove, Allah, Indra, etc. And if these names were merely synonyms for the idea of God apart from the trivial and erroneous mythologies with which they are connected, I should have no reason to object to them.

The argument in my brief hint that universal consciousness asserting the existence of God is some proof that he does exist is stronger than you imagine. You are, however, so prone to caricature that it is veiled in your parody of it. It does not lie in the absurd reasoning you erroneously impute to me—"the belief of a million times as many beings as ever inhabited this globe is not sufficient to bring into existence one single fairy, one single genius, or one single god." But this is a curious problem how the universal belief in a power superior to nature arose if there is no such power. That the forces of nature were the origin of many of the deities of pagan pantheons is beyond dispute; but in some of the oldest religions, notably the Aryan and the Egyptian, the further they are traced back the many gods disappear, the mythology becomes simpler, until the reality bursts upon us, one glorious, underived Spirit—the Creator and Ruler of the universe—is alone the doctrine taught. Beyond this there is no vision; history dawns, as every other branch of true learning must, with the acknowledgment of one God. My argument is, if God does not exist, how came this universal knowledge of him at the earliest times—the times which alone can show us, if any can, any likeness to primitive man? His existence, and the revelation of it to our race in its infancy, is the only satisfactory explanation of it.

The illustration of a deaf mute who growing up uneducated presents a tabula rasa as to ideas of any sort is too unsubstantial proof for an argument of this kind. An investigation, which I of course could not make in time to use, might reveal a different view, and, besides, it proves too much on your own evidence. The deaf mute has no ideas at all—absolutely none of any kind. "An education," you quote approvingly, "which so much more than develops, seems to actually create a mind and conscience." A mindless imbecile seems a fit proof of Atheism.

Your next paragraph as to the results of education is one of Volney's great pillars. It is also the teaching of the scriptures, and is one reason why such severe punishment was meted to him who seduced his neighbor into idolatry or taught the doctrines of the heathens. But there is this distinction to be remarked, that while a child bred a Mohammedan will surely become a Mussulman, or a Buddhist take refuge in Buddha, yet a child brought up under Christian teaching less often becomes a Christian. The spectacle of a minister's son turning out a wild rake is so frequent as to be a proverb. Men love darkness rather than light even in a so-called Christian country, and conversion is not a matter of education, but a work of God. An apostate Mussulman or an Infidel from Buddhism is, in his native country, a rare occurrence; but from their very birth the children of Christian parents hate studying the scriptures, hearing a sermon, or spending an hour in prayer.

Your next paragraph opens, "It is true that when we find anything that bears the proof of having been constructed, we naturally think some body must have made it." Yes, quite naturally, and we very obstinately hold on to that belief. It seems, however, that we must not think naturally in regard to the making of the universe, but *un*naturally. Paley, to be sure, showed practical common sense in believing that the watch he found had an intelligent maker. In fact, to put it mildly, he would have been an idiot to have thought otherwise. "But it is very absurd to judge of the world or the universe of thousands and millions of worlds by a watch." Why? "When we find a world we have no reason to think it was put together as a man forms a watch." Why? besides Paley does not reason from a watch to a world. "Paley did not think his watchmaker," you continue, "made his watch from nothing, but simply that he formed its wheels and all its parts of metals already in existence and put them together, but with the world he pretends [generous critic] to believe that its maker created it from nothing at all." As I have said, Paley does not reason from a watch to a world, but from a watch to an eye, then to an ear, then to the succession of plants and animals, then to a study of comparative anatomy, etc. I do not recall any statement in the book (Paley's Natural Theology) based on the creation of the universe by the fiat of the Deity from nothing. The reader had better read the grand old argument for himself. The analogy between a watch and an eye is perfect, so with an ear and all the instances of contrivance he examines. Let me quote you again: "Paley did not think his watchmaker made his watch from nothing." No, neither did he believe God made an eye from nothing, "but simply that he formed its wheels and all its parts of metals already in existence;" exactly so of the eye, the ear, etc.—man was formed of the dust of the earth—"and put them together"—again the type is fulfilled. Confess, is not the analogy perfect?

Wandering again in your eccentric orbit—for you have joined two things, as I have shown, that Paley does not unite—you dubiously assert, "If the material of which the world was made had a previous and eternal existence, then it was not a creation, but merely a transformation." Yes, if. "If it is admitted then, that matter always existed, it must be admitted that force, which is always inherent in it, always existed, together with the laws controling them." IF. This is an inglorious begging of the whole question. If the matter always existed, the force always did—there is no dispute of that; but please prove that the force always existed. I say it did not, that the force had a commencement when it began to act—that it began to act within time, not from eternity, and consequently that matter also had a beginning. Please furnish me with proof that I am wrong; in other words, demonstrate that force is eternal. Scientists, assisted by geology and chemical analysis, can reduce matter to its constituent atoms, behind which there could have been no change. Here was the beginning of forces, because here the forces commenced to act; if they had existed before they must necessarily have acted. And as matter and force, as science asserts and you admit, were coeval, here was the birth of both. Prove your side then—that force was eternal. It will not be very strong proof to repeat, however, that "if—if—if matter is eternal force is." I do not admit that matter is eternal. Of course, I know, "it is far easier for you to regard the universe as eternal," but I want proof, proof, proof.

You have rather sneered at the "design argument" because it is threadbare. Well, then, it should be so much the easier demolished. If your argument so far examined is a specimen of your strength, I can hardly think you overwhelming. Let me see.

I "hold that the harmony, adaptation, and design in the universe are proofs of a God." Undoubtedly, even though they are not to you. "But they prove too much and consequently prove nothing." Well, how?

"If harmony, adaptation, and apparent design in the universe require a creator so must the same qualities always require a creator wherever they may exist." This is ambiguous; what do you mean by the "qualities" harmony, adaptation, etc., found in the universe, and the same qualities found, as your words say by implication, elsewhere? I am afraid you are playing the cuttle-fish. You continue, "If a being created the universe and imparted to it harmony, adaptation, and design, he possessed those qualities in still larger degree, for as no stream can rise above its fountain, so no being can create anything superior to himself; so God could not impart to the universe any more harmony, adaptation, and design than he possessed himself, and probably not so much." To me I confess this is a curious mixture of words. What do you mean by the "harmony, adaptation, and design" of God? However, I will let this pass, interpreting it to mean that God is an intelligent contriver. Your next sentence is (a), "If, then, the existence of harmony, adaptation, and design in the universe proves that it was created from nothing (b), the same qualities in God prove that he was created from nothing."

(a) I have never asserted nor attempted to prove that "the existence of harmony, adaptation, and design in the universe proves that it was created from nothing," but merely applied the principle that evident marks of contrivance prove a contriver. Your premise, to call it that, therefore is altogether erroneous. Consequently

(b) Your deduction must be also; but again I ask, what do you mean by transferring to God the same qualities as are found in the universe? How can you identify harmony of physical form, adaptation of laws, and physical marks of contrivance with intelligence and wisdom in the contriver. In other words, how can you transfer qualities of matter to qualities of mind and assume them to be identical as the basis of an argument? It is utterly fallacious and illogical. I can very easily throw my argument into a syllogism thus:

Adaptation, harmony, and design prove a designer.

The universe manifests adaptation, harmony, and design.

Therefore the universe has a designer. This would be correct reasoning, but yours cannot by any correct logic be proved. The fact is, you have epitomized Mr. Underwood's illogical attempt at deep reasoning, and it is no more successful with you than him.

"Design belongs to a finite being and not the infinite." Why? and, to establish an exact understanding, what do you mean by the infinite? It is a floating, vague, undefinable phrase.

"Design implies the use of means to reach an end." Yes, but there is nothing that conflicts with the idea of divinity in this. "Design implies the necessity of change, modification of purpose to meet rising wants." This I absolutely deny, and challenge you to prove it.

What I have said above utterly undermines your proof from analogy of the eternity of the universe. God cannot be described as possessing harmony, adaptation, and design in the sense I affirm it of the universe.

I do not care to multiply words again over the existence of evil. It does not prove that there is no God; it does not overthrow the design argument, and it is rash and unscientific to rush to any such conclusion.

I have already made some strictures on your views of the potentiality of matter. They are hardly necessary to be repeated here. If you would only realize that mere assertion is not proof, and would clearly state your doctrine and support with the facts and conclusions which prove it, I would be glad to thoroughly examine them.

Whether life preceded or is coeval with organization you call a hair-splitting question; but you evidently attach more importance to it than you would confess. I will say no more here than to furnish you with the reference you ask for as to Prof. Huxley's assertion that they are not coeval, but on the contrary life can exist apart from organization. You will find it in his "Elements of Comparative Anatomy," pages 10 and 11.

In regard to the chapters I quoted from the Khandagya-Upanishad, I quoted them merely as a sample of what the Hindoo sacred books consist of. I admit that here and there are gems of thought and morality scattered through them; but it is only by wading through pages of such infantile babblings as I have quoted that they are occasionally found. Your own quotations show the immense superiority of the scriptures. All the sublimity and moral grandeur are there without the trivial folly. Your attempt at contrasting the scriptures with these exhibits a critical faculty that would perceive, if consistent, no incongruity in comparing Shakspere with Walt Whitman.

How utterly different the scriptures are from every other book; how infinitely above them in their teachings, their purity, their majesty! Let me make a few quotations from their sublime unfolding of the character of God:

The Creator.—In the beginning God created heaven and the earth; and the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. And God said, Let there be light, and there was light, etc. (Gen. i). Thou hast made heaven the heaven of heavens and all their host, the earth and all things that are therein, the seas and all that is therein; and thou hast preserved them all (Neh. ix, 6). He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. Seeth under the whole heaven to make the weight for the winds; and he weigheth the waters by measure. Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds, the wondrous works of him who is perfect in knowledge? Hast thou with him spread out the sky? Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding, when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy; or who shut up the sea with doors when it broke forth as if it had issued out of the womb when I made the cloud the garment thereof, and and thick darkness a swaddling-band for it (Job). I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground, by my great power and by my outstretched arm, and have given it unto whom it seemed meet unto me (Jer. xvvii, 5). God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. Out of it wast thou [man] taken, for dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return.

God Eternal and Unchangeable.—God is not a man that he should lie; neither the son of man that he should repent; hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken and shall he not make it good? (Num. xxiii, 19). The eternal God. The counsel of the Lord standeth forever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations. Thou, O Lord, shalt endure forever, and thy remembrance unto all generations. Thy years are throughout all generations. Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shalt perish, but thou shalt endure; yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment, as a vesture shalt thou change them and they shall be changed. But thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end (Psalms). I am the first and I am the last, and besides me there is no God (Isa. xlviii, 12).

God Infinite and Unsearchable.—The secret things belong unto the Lord our God. Will God indeed dwell in the earth? Behold, the heaven and heaven of heaven cannot contain thee! Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is high as heaven. What canst thou do? Deeper than hell, what canst thou know? Great things doeth he which we cannot comprehend. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I cannot attain to it. Great is our Lord, and of great power; his understanding is infinite.

God Invisible, Omnipotent, and Omniscient.—Ye saw no similitude on the day that the Lord spoke unto you in Horeb out of the midst of fire (Deut. iv, 15). Lo, he goeth by me and I see him not; he passeth on also, but I perceive him not. Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him; on the left hand where he doth work, but I cannot behold him. He hideth himself on the right hand that I cannot see him (Job). God is a spirit. No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him.

I am the Almighty God. The Lord killeth and maketh alive; he bringeth down to the grave and bringeth up. The Lord maketh poor and maketh rich; he bringeth low and lifteth up. The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken to pieces (1 Sam. 2). Thine, O Lord, is the greatness and the power and the glory and the victory and the majesty. In thine hand is power and might, and in thine hand it is to make great and to give strength unto all (1 Chron. xxix, 11). Lord, it is nothing to thee to help, whether with many or with them that have no power. The eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth to show himself strong on behalf of them whose heart is perfect toward him (2 Chron.). The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed. The Lord seeth not as man seeth, for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart (1 Sam.). Shall any teach God knowledge, seeing he judgeth those that are high? Times are not hidden from the Almighty. Hell is naked before him, and destruction hath no covering. His eyes are upon the ways of man, and he seeth all his goings. There is no darkness nor shadow of death where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves (Job).

God Holy, Just, Loving, and Merciful.—I, the Lord, your God, am holy. The heavens are not clear in his sight—behold, even to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight. Far be it from God that be should do wickedness, and from the Almighty that he should commit iniquity. The righteous Lord loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright. The word of the Lord is right, and all his works are done in truth. He loveth righteousness and judgment.

He is the Rock. His way is perfect, for all his ways are judgment. A God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he. There is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts. Justice and judgment are the habitations of thy throne. He shall render to every man according to his works.

Oh, how great is the goodness which thou hast wrought for them that trust in thee before the sons of men. He loveth him that followeth after righteousness. God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life.

God commandeth his love toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us.

I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth, neither will I again smite any more everything living as I have done (by the deluge).

If I find in Sodom five righteous within the city, then will I spare all the place for their sakes. Then he crieth unto me, I will hear, for I am gracious. The Lord is long-suffering and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression. The Lord your God is gracious and merciful and will not turn away his face from you, if ye return unto him. His anger endureth but a moment, in his favor is life. There is forgiveness with thee that thou mayest be feared.

Thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and forsakest them not. In the time of their trouble, when they cried unto thee, thou heardest them from heaven; and according to thy manifold mercies thou gavest them saviors who saved them out of the hands of their enemies. When they returned and cried unto thee, thou heardest them from heaven, and many times didst thou deliver them according to thy mercies. And testified against them, that thou mightest bring them again unto thy law. Yet many years didst thou forbear them and testifiedest against them by thy spirit in thy prophets. For thy great mercies' sake thou didst not utterly consume them nor forsake them, for thou art a gracious and merciful God (Neh. ix).

The same Lord over all is such unto ALL that call upon him. For whosoever calleth upon the name of the Lord shall be saved.

Is there any similar teaching in any of these books you adduce? Where I have quoted one verse I could have quoted ten, all declaring the power, glory, love, mercy, and grace of this wonderful God, but outside of the Bible no parallel can be adduced. This is only one topic; the scriptures are equally explicit upon every topic that is of vital importance for man to know. The awful character of sin, the only way of escape from it, the highest good, the way of happiness, the destiny of man, all are revealed with a tender, importunate grace, beseeching every man to listen and partake. But these are peculiarities of the Bible.

In its teachings as to moral and social duties, how superior the Bible is to every other book! How wise, how excellent, how beneficent the laws of Moses! Can you truly affirm that you believe that any of the lawgivers and books you have quoted from teach as true morality, as exalted doctrine, as the Bible? Let me quote again. First the Ten Commandments:

Thou shalt have no other gods before me.

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image or the likeness of anything that is in heaven above or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth; thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them, for I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates, for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day, wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it.

Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

Thou shalt not kill.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

Thou shalt not steal.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's.

[Or, briefly summarized, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul; and with all thy strength and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself.

Is not the above law absolutely perfect? Does it not embrace everything without redundancy, without omitting anything? Is it not a perfect code? Can you adduce any other at all comparable with it?]

None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him, to uncover their nakedness. I am the Lord.

Thou shalt not lie carnally with thy neighbor's wife to defile thyself with her.

Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things, for in all these the nations are defiled which I cast out before you: and the land is defiled, therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants.

Turn ye not unto idols, nor make to yourselves molten gods.

Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another.

And ye shall not swear by my name falsely, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God. I am the Lord.

Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbor, neither rob him; the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning.

Thou shalt not curse the deaf nor put a stumbling-block before the blind, but shalt fear thy God.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, thou shalt not respect the person of the poor nor honor the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbor.

Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer among thy people, neither shalt thou stand against the blood of thy neighbor.

Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart; thou shalt not in any wise rebuke thy neighbor, and not suffer sin upon him.

Thou shalt not avenge nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head and honor the face of the old man.

And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land ye shall not vex him, but the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.

Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin shall ye have.

Thou shalt not raise a false report; put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness.

Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil; neither shalt thou speak in a cause to decline after many to wrest judgment.

If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again.

If thou seest the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden and wouldest forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help him. (Lev. xviii; Ex. xxii, xxiii.)

I could quote page after page of similar laws—unswervingly just and upright and yet full of compassion and beneficence. There is nothing equal to them in the books of any other people. I could quote also to you instructions from the book of Proverbs full of wisdom and truth, the which, if made the basis of action and life by any one would mold an exalted character and lead to assured success and happiness.

But granting, as I cheerfully do, that the ancient sages taught many golden truths, it is utterly impossible to find a parallel character to Christ. The Christ of the New Testament is a marvel of character—the one absolutely perfect man. Confessed so among Infidels even, by Rousseau, by John Stuart Mill, by the great Napoleon, he is to all ages and nations the ideal of the perfect man—the revelation of the heart of God. Without fear of contradiction, I assert that there can be adduced no likeness to him. Buddha, Confucius, Mohammed—none of them are worthy to unloose the latchet of his sandal.

Yours truly, G. M. MAIR.

The Temple of Humanity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Ten years ago or more I addressed to the New York Herald a communication, which was published on a Sunday morning, advocating the erection in our city of a "Temple of Humanity." My idea was to construct massiv vaults, for the storage of valuables, in the basement, with stores on the ground floor, and apartments or offices on the third and fourth, the entire second story to be reserved for the grand assembly room; and I rejoice now to find this project in such good hands as Mr. Courtlandt Palmer's, whom I beg to assign me one share of the stock. Grove Meeting.

There will be a Liberal and Spiritualist grove meeting in Cherry Valley, Ashtabula Co., Ohio, on Sunday, July 17th. The first discourse will be at 10.30 A. M., after which there will be an intermission of one hour and a half and a picnic dinner, to be followed by two discourses in the afternoon. Moses and Mattie E. Hull, of Linesville Station, Penn., are engaged as speakers. Their reputation here will insure a large attendance. Come early and bring your baskets well filled, and let us hav a time long to be remembered. MELVIN SPRAGUE.

Discussion.

Our Nineteenth Letter to Mr. Mair.

STILL A LITTLE MORE ABOUT GOD AND BIBLES.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: There is little need of replying at length to the flounderings and spasmodic contortions exhibited in your last letter. There are two reasons why this course is unadvisable. First. Our time is getting short, and we have yet much ground to go over and there is but little time left in which to do it. In four weeks I expect to be on the Atlantic ocean, plowing my way to Europe on my journey around the world, and this discussion must be closed before I leave, as I expect to be absent the better part of a year, and possibly may never return. Second. You have not affected one of my arguments, nor produced the slightest proof that there is any such being as a God in existence. Indeed, your tergiversations border on the ludicrous. At one moment you seem disposed to throw the Jewish God overboard and catch at the next best one that offers. You say in one instance that you do not assert the identity of the real God with Jehovah, and in the next minute you quote lengthy unmeaning verbosity about this very Yahweh, or Jehovah, and which you claim to believe he wrote, to prove that he exists and that he discounts and surpasses all the gods of other nations. At one moment you weaken on Yahweh, and in the next you boast of his superiority over all competitors and claim that his book excels all others.

If Yahweh, or Jehovah, is not the true God, if the true God of the universe is older, wiser, stronger, and a better designer than the old Jewish conception, Yahweh and your entire theological system fall to the ground; for your system, your revelation, your divine book, your begotten and crucified savior, and your entire stock in trade go with him. From Yahweh you obtain all, and with him you lose all.

At one moment you almost scout the idea that God created the universe from nothing, and impliedly assert that Paley did not teach that the universe was made of nothing; and in the next breath you take the opposite stand, that matter and force are not eternal, but were brought into existence by this Jewish God some six thousand years ago. This may not be the "cuttle-fish" style of argument, but were it asserted to be in the style of a demented member of the cynocephalus tribe I would hardly dispute it. At all events, you evince a disposition to play fast and loose, to blow hot and cold, if not in the same breath, so nearly so that the difference is unappreciable.

According to the theological idea God is the author of all that exists, and the universe, with its thousands of suns and worlds was brought into existence only six thousand years age, and absolutely made from nothing. This is decidedly the most monstrous absurdity that man could conceive. Geology utterly disproves it; the strata of the earth have been millions of years in forming. Chemistry disproves it, as it has over and over again been demonstrated that not an atom of matter can be produced from nonentity, and that not an atom can be destroyed or changed into nonentity. To a mind not warped by theological error the idea that all the matter of which the cosmos is composed, with its millions of suns and worlds, was spoken or brought into existence from absolute nothing by a one-horse god, invented over among the hills of Palestine, is one of the most monstrous that ever entered the mind of man. Common sense disproves it, and utterly discards such an absurdity. If it is admitted that the material of which the suns and worlds were made had a previous chaotic existence and Yahweh did not absolutely make it from nothing, then he and the fallacious system built upon his name utterly fall to the ground. One of these propositions must be true: 1. The vast universe of suns and worlds and an infinite ocean of ethereal matter was made from nothing; or, 2. The universe is eternal in its nature and never was made, never was designed, and is in no way indebted to the Jewish Yahweh for its existence. These two theories are before the world. Theology, the Bible, and superstition teach the first, and science, reason, and common sense the second. All are free to take their choice between the two theories. You choose the first, I the second. You, of course, have by far the larger number of companions, but those on my side are rapidly increasing. In the irrepressible conflict between theology and science the first is doomed to go to the wall. This is inevitable, defend it however much you will.

Paley's design argument is still your chief reliance, and the flounderings in your effort to show that the universe contains some qualities not existent in its supposed maker are almost painful to witness. The case is indeed very simple. If the universe was created by Yahweh, or any other god, all the grandeur and perfection exhibited in it, including harmony, order, and adaptation, must have been imparted by its creator, and could have come from no other source. It also follows that whatever qualities were imparted by the creator must have been inherent in him before they were so imparted. Unless he had them to impart it is extremely difficult to see how they could have been bestowed. No being, however exalted, can give anything not in his power to give, nor can he create anything more wonderful or more powerful than himself. If, then, that the universe contains order, harmony, adaptation, beauty, grandeur, perfection, or whatever qualities may be assigned to it, proves that it is not eternal, that it was created, and was formed of nothing, the same kind of argument must inevitably prove that its maker, who must at least possess as much of all these grand qualities as the universe does, must also have had a creator, and that he was also made of nothing. I do not see how you can possibly get away from this conclusion. If order, harmony, and adaptation necessitate a contriver, designer, or creator in the universe, they do also in a god or in any number of gods, and all the Paleys in the theological ranks can giv you no relief in the matter. If harmony, order, and perfection are eternal qualities in a god, why may they not also be in the universe? I will go just a step further and say that inasmuch as order, harmony, adaptation, grandeur, beauty, and perfection exist inherently in the universe and show not the slightest proofs of having been designed and imparted to it by any extraneous person or power, it is far more reasonable to give the universe the credit of being what it is rather than to deprive it of that to which it is justly entitled, for the sake of giving the honor to a vague, indefinite, fickle, irascible, imaginary, imperfect god who has no existence save in the superstitious imaginations of men, who by his own confession on a certain occasion was unable to drive out the inhabitants of one of the valleys of Canaan because they had chariots of iron (Judges i, 19).

You deny that design and contrivance imply the necessity of change and modification of purpose to meet rising wants, and challenge me to prove it. This will be easy to do. A designer or contriver, though he may have a general plan to carry out, has to fit and try, modify, change and contrive as he progresses with his work, as the first watchmaker may be supposed to have done, as Watts did with his steam-engine, Stephenson with his locomotive, and Fulton with his steamboat. It was the same with Yahweh, he changed his plans on several occasions, notably when he made woman. It would seem from the narrative that he did not originally intend to have any companion for the man, but finding that he was rather lonesome and needed a companion and helpmeet, he put him to sleep and performed the first surgical operation on record, and taking out a rib made a woman. But we learn further on that he got very sick of his job and "repented that he created man," and then laid another plan how to kill him off, and in pursuance of the latter plan sent an immense flood and drowned the men, women, children, and animals of the world, all like a colony of rats, together. But that plan was no better designed than the other, and he had to design again when he concluded to beget a pure, innocent son of his own and then put him to death to get himself into a good humor and keep him from killing the entire human race again. But this plan also proved abortive; the world is still just as wicked as ever, and men go to the bad as persistently as of yore. If a being of infinite power and wisdom wished to make a world and people it he would not need to work a week over it, working and designing step after step, but could speak it into existence with a word, as he did the sun, when after working three days in the dark he said, "Let there be light," and the whole thing was accomplished in an instant. That is the way for an infinite and omnipotent God to make a universe. He did not need to stop to design it. It is only finite beings who need to design.

In your efforts to show that matter and the universe are not eternal, but transitory, you ask exultingly for "proofs" of its eternality. We have the best proofs in the world—not an atom can be created, not an atom can be destroyed. It unquestionably is eternal. I cannot conceive what better proofs could be asked for. Still, when I ask you to give me a little proof that your God has a real existence you utterly fail to comply with my request, but in relation to the eternal existence of matter you cry yourself hoarse shouting "proofs, proofs, proofs." In this very instance you give ample evidence of the weakness of your cause and the unprovable character of your God. Could you prove the existence of any god as thoroughly as the eternality of matter and force is demonstrated, you would establish his existence a hundred times better than has ever yet been done.

You taunt me, as you have before done in a similar manner, with availing myself of the ideas of others. This time it is Volney and Underwood that I am accused of borrowing from; sometimes it is Voltaire and Paine. Well, what of it, even if it is true? Is there any wrong in appropriating truth, or what is believed to be truth, wherever in the public domain it is found? I think I have given no pledge that I would not use an argument or make a statement used by a predecessor, nor have I understood you to exact anything of the kind. Let me ask you in return, are you always original? Do you not use arguments advanced by others? I will remark that if you originate all you have written, your inventive powers are cast in a mold very similar to that of other theologians, for your arguments are like theirs, and your language is so familiar that it sounds much like what I heard before you were born. You have advanced little or nothing new, and let me add, if not too offensive, very little that is true.

You attach more importance to the superstitions of the human race of three or four thousand years ago than now with their present advanced intelligence and civilization. You seem to think men could have had more correct conceptions of God then than now, and that their incorrect notions should be accepted by us. I deem you wrong in this. The farther we trace the mind of men back to the primitive ages, the more we find it enveloped in ignorance and superstition, and far less reliable as authority for our guidance. Besides easily believing in gods and devils, they of olden times accepted dragons, fairies, witches, nymphs, and all kinds of non-existent, impossible monsters. If they were correct as to the gods, they were as to the rest. These conceits should be regarded with the utmost caution and circumspection. It is safe to discard all their theological and illogical vagaries. God showed himself to man no more then than now, and all that has been transmitted down to us from those times about gods and devils is wholly due to their ignorance and their imaginations.

You admit that with many of the ancient nations the forces of nature afforded the foundation of belief in the gods, but try to make an exception of the Aryans and the Egyptians. No such exception should be made. They were really the most thorough nature-worshipers of all. Indra, Varuna, Agni, Maruts, etc., of the ancient Aryans in Vedic times were simply personifications of the sun, the air, the dawn, fire, the winds, the storms, and the other phenomena and forces of nature. It was the same with Ahura, or Ormuzd, Mithra, and Ahriman of the ancient Persians, with Ra, Jupiter-Ammon, Helios, Osiris, Horus, Typhon, etc., of the Egyptians. These represented the sun, light, heat, darkness, and the various conditions of nature and its forces. It was the same with the Thunderer Jove, Neptune, Apollo, or Sol, Pluto, Ceres, Aurora, etc, of the Grecians and Romans. It was the same with Odin, Thor, Balder, Ymir, etc., of the Scandinavians. These gods were simply personifications of Nature, her forces and phenomena. And so it has been with the gods of all nations. That it was originally similar with the Jews, that their god was a nature god, there are good reasons for believing. In a former letter I quoted numerous passages from the Bible, showing that Yahweh, or Jehovah, was regarded as a nature-god; it is not necessary to repeat them. Of course through the policy of priests, and to further their selfish interests, many subsequent claims were set up about the gods, and many theories were propagated about their creating the world, making man, governing the human race, etc. Theology, with all its absurdities, and falsehoods, was gradually adopted, and the original simple nature-worship was lost. The priests thus sent to the background the more beautiful worship of nature, and in its place they taught the existence of the gods, the autocrats of heaven and earth, whose ministers, interpreters, and counselors they were. In this way theology became the darkest, falsest, and most pernicious set of dogmas that ever cursed the human race.

You treat mind as an entity, an original and independent form of existence, and in it you find an analogy or representative of God. You say: "That there is a something which thinks, feels, wills, a something apart from and dissimilar, is recognized universally. This is mind." Here you are wrong again in your conclusions. With characteristic assurance you ask, "Do you call mind substance?" No, I do not call it substance, but it is a concomitant or result of substance, or matter, and never exists only as it is produced by matter or substance in a high or advanced state of organization. As animal life never exists in any degree of perfection only where organs of digestion, assimilation, circulation, motion, sensation, locomotion, etc., exist, so thoughts and mind exist only where there is a brain and mental organization more or less perfect, in exact proportion to their organization. Many of the low forms of animal life have very imperfect mental organization. Oysters probably do not think profoundly, but they think some. They think enough to open their castles and take their food and to shut them when danger approaches, and to propagate their offspring. This is all their organization admits of. As we rise in the scale of animal life we find that certain genera and species, of which spiders, ants, bees, rats, badgers, foxes, dogs, monkeys, horses, and elephants, etc., may be taken as samples, think far more perfectly and even reason with much shrewdness, and always in strict proportion to their organizations. Man of course thinks still more perfectly, reasons more correctly, philosophizes more elaborately, than any other animal, and the cause for this is to be seen in his larger brain, its more perfect organization, its greatly increased convolutions, and its far greater preponderance of the gray matter composing the brain.

It is now nearly as well settled that the brain is the organ of the mind or thinking process as that the ear is of hearing, the nose of smelling, the mouth, tongue, and palate of tasting, the tongue, etc., for talking, the nerves for feeling and sensation, the muscles for strength and motion. All the organs have their appropriate functions to perform and one cannot perform the functions of another.

As the eye does the seeing, so the brain and the nervous system do the thinking. There is no more a separate, independent existence or fountain of thinking, or mind, somewhere in the universe than there is of sight or hearing. These functions are the concomitants of animal life, and are sustained by the food that is eaten and digested. The stomach, the digestive, assimilative, and circulatory apparatus have much to do with these processes. With a diseased stomach and imperfect digestion there cannot be a good, vigorous mind. If the body is feeble and diseased, so is the mind; they go together, and the mind is the product of the body and its organs. What the coal and water are to the engine in hauling a heavy train, what hay and oats are to the horse in helping him to run fleetly or draw the loaded cart, bread, meat, and potatoes are to the man in keeping up the functions of life, including the thinking process. As without coal and water the train must stop, as without hay and oats the horse cannot run nor draw the cart, so without his food man cannot move a muscle or have a thought. As by the correlation of the material forces and mechanical appliances the coal is converted into rapid motion of the train; as the hay and oats are converted into the muscular strength of the horse, so the bread, meat, and potatoes which man eats are, by his organic processes, so to speak, ground up into muscular motion, sensation, sight, hearing, and thinking. If the food is not absolutely converted into thoughts or mind, it enables the process to be performed. And all this is perfectly natural and easy. There is nothing supernatural in the existence or production of mind, any more than there is in that of muscle, and mind does not go an inch in proving the existence of a creator. There is no creator. Creation is a myth. Existence always was in some form. Transformations and evolutions of matter are forever taking place; and this is what nature is constantly doing. No creator, no superintendent, no god is required to keep the wonderful machinery moving. It is a perpetual motion that forever runs itself. It cannot wear out; it cannot be destroyed; it cannot end. It has existed forever, and it must continue to exist forever. Nature is immensely grander than all the gods that ignorant man has devised.

I am sorry you think so much of imaginary gods and so little of nature or matter. With me, matter and its forces are all that exist. Matter is, I repeat, the highest, the lowest, the widest, the narrowest; it is all; it is the MOST HIGH; the ALL IN ALL; the SUPREME POWER. Its intricacy, its susceptibility, its powers and potencies are far less understood than they should be. If the time and thought that have been devoted to the study of gods had been directed to the study of matter, its laws and capabilities, far better would it have been for the human race, far better would it have been for the profit and happiness of the world. The study of nature is infinitely more remunerative than the study of gods and devils.

Yes, there are many facts in nature and the constitution of matter that men should understand far better than they do. It is generally accepted that matter is presented to our senses in various conditions or grades, from the bank of gravel and the strata of granite to the bodies of trees, the limpid streams and lakes, the atmosphere, oxygen, hydrogen, and the luminiferous ether. Scientists have traced it to its ultimate atoms and have approximately determined the size of an ultimate atom, though they have never discovered a possibility of creating or destroying a single atom. They estimate that 200,000,000 atoms placed in a line measure one inch; hence a square inch superficial measure contains 40,000,000,000,000,000 atoms, while a single cubic inch of water contains the incomprehensible aggregate of 8,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 of atoms. Each of these atoms is an eternal, uncreatable, indestructible entity, with life, motion, and force commensurate with its bulk and weight. Each of these atoms may be far more rationably termed a god than any of the creations of Hindoo, Persian, Egyptian, Semitic, Grecian, Scandinavian, African, or American races, and any one of these original atoms possesses more real power than all the imaginary gods and devils of those races combined.

Although water is but one-eleventh part the density of lead, one-fourteenth that of mercury, one-nineteenth that of gold, it is 770 times as dense as the atmosphere, and occupies 17,000 times its bulk when converted by heat into steam; while the atmosphere is estimated to be one million times heavier or denser than the most rarefied forms of matter. For a long time matter was divided into three general classes or conditions: 1. solid; 2. liquid; 3. gaseous; beyond this the learned did not presume to go. But now it is found by experimental scientists that matter exists as really in a fourth condition, as much more attenuated, subtilized, and refined than the atmosphere or the gases, as the air is more subtilized and lighter than water or even than the granite. When a conception is reached of a form of matter a million times lighter than air, we have arrived at something analogous to the fourth condition of matter, where there is no pressure, where the atoms are independent and do not crowd upon each other. Even in this form of matter there is life and constant motion. The atoms of matter are ever in motion. It is as impossible for matter to be inert or dead as to cease to exist. The inertia of matter is as absurd as is the existence of a creator of matter. Inertia is one of the greatest fallacies that scientists have believed in. All matter is full of life and energy, either active or latent. A fragment of limestone may strike you as being dead or inert, but pour a little sulphuric acid upon it and what activity is at once exhibited; force is at once eliminated, and while decomposition takes place another composition is formed. A lump of coal may be taken for inert matter, but a greater mistake could not be made. It is the very embodiment of life and force, which perhaps millions of years ago, in the form of light and heat, were thrown off from the sun and in the coal plant garnered up for future ages. It only has to go through the process of combustion when light, heat, and electricity are produced in great quantity.

Much is now known of the three cruder conditions of matter, but comparativly little is yet known of the fourth condition. Learned scientists of our own country and of Europe are now intently giving their attention to learning more of this fourth condition. It has thus far been found impossible to exhaust any reservoir so perfectly as to produce a complete vacuum. No air-pump has been constructed that will exhaust all the air from any given vessel. With the most perfect air-pump, the aid of the quicksilver process, and the introduction of caustic potash, which has a powerful affinity for the carbonic acid gas and the oxygen that may remain in the air not pumped out, a condition analogous to the fourth condition of matter is reached. A condition is reached in which electricity is no longer luminous, and through which it will not pass, though platinum points are brought within a quarter of an inch of each other, and the fluid has only that distance to pass from point to point. With all this no perfect vacuum has ever been evolved—not even a cubic foot of nothing has been produced—not a half cubic foot where matter does not eternally exist, charged with force and life.

This fourth condition is analogous to the state termed ether, which fills the vast interstellar spaces in which millions of suns and stars unceasingly roll and course for millions of years, but which must be invisible from one to the other were there no material medium in the vast vault of the universe through which light can travel. This fourth condition of matter may form the pabulum of which spirit bodies are composed, if there be such. Yes, spirit may be a condition of matter closely analogous to this fourth condition. Science may yet make all this clear.

As it was the light of science of nearly three centuries ago that demonstrated the rotundity of the earth and the correctness of the heliocentric system; as it was the scientists of the last century that brought the existence of oxygen and hydrogen to the knowledge of men; as the scientists of the present day have established the eternality of matter and its inherent force and life, so it may be the province of the future scientists to bring to our knowledge much information of the fourth condition of matter and the wonders in it yet to be revealed. I need not again tell you how much higher I regard the powers, potencies, capabilities, and possibilities of matter than all the crude ideas of gods and devils about which men have busied themselves for thousands of years. But I wish to assure you that if you and other theologians will abandon the study of myths in the form of gods and devils, and will devote your attention to the study of realities, the various forms of matter and force with their potencies and qualities, you will find the study far more satisfactory and beneficial.

It is almost amusing to see you willing to find consolation from an occasional hint here and there dropped by Comte, Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, and others, as though they in the slightest degree entertain a belief in the god of theology. Not one of them does. Even you gladly quote Paine when it suits you to do so. It is only another proof of the weakness of your cause and the light quality of your arguments. There will inevitably be a diversity of opinion among philosophers, scientists, and men of thought, but not one of the scientists you named comes within a thousand miles of accepting the theological idea of a God who, a few thousand years ago, created millions of suns and worlds from nothing. They believe matter to be eternal, and that change and evolution are eternal. It matters not whether they and I precisely agree or not; but this much is sure: they come far nearer to the position I occupy—a belief that the universe contains all that exists—than to the position you occupy—that an imaginary God made it all from nothing. I certainly agree with Prof. Tyndall when, in his Belfast Inaugural Address, after quoting approvingly Lucretius, who says, "Nature is seen to do all things spontaneously of herself without the meddling of the gods;" and Bruno when he declares that matter is not "that mere empty capacity which philosophers have pictured her to be, but the universal mother who brings forth all things as the fruit of her own womb," he goes on to say: "The questions here raised are inevitable. They are approaching us with accelerated speed, and it is not a matter of indifference whether they are introduced with reverence or irreverence. Abandoning all disguise, the confession I feel bound to make before you is that I prolong the vision backward across the boundary of the experimental evidence, and discern in that matter, which we in our ignorance, and notwithstanding our professed reverence for its creator, have hitherto covered with opprobrium, the promise and potency of every form and quality of life." Also when he says, "As far as the eye of science has hitherto ranged through nature, no intrusion of purely creative power into any series of phenomena has ever been observed." There is no room for the belief in a creative god in the mind of such a well-informed man.

Thomas Paine was a grand man—an unbeliever in the divine inspiration of a book or in any revealed religion. In this his mind was clear, and his arguments are unanswerable. In all this I find it easy to agree with him, but his mind was not illumined to see all the grandeur and beauty of the universe to the extent that it was not indebted to a designer and creator for existence. He was a Deist. He believed in some kind of a personal, creative god, and herein he had not fully become emancipated from the rule of superstition. So far he had not found the whole truth, and so far I cannot agree with him. I claim to have progressed beyond the position he occupied, and to have approached nearer the temple of truth. He uttered bold and brave words, and his memory must ever be held in high honor. But so far as he held to a lingering faith in a vague, imaginary being or person who made the universe from nothing he was in error.

I can easily understand why you do not care to dwell farther upon the question of the origin of evil. So long as you believe that the Jewish God is the author of all things, all beings, all existences, and knew beforehand what the results of his experiments would be, you must hold him responsible for the existence of evil. You cannot possibly escape from this conclusion, and the less you say about it the better for your consistency.

THE BOOK OF PURITY AND MORALITY.

You wind up your letter with extended quotations from the Jewish scriptures, some of which are well enough in the way of ancient poetry and extravaganza, while some in the light of modern science are extremely ridiculous. I am only sorry I have not more time and space to criticise some of your quotations, to show their absurdity, and the impossibility of their being utterances of an all-wise creator who not only made the world on which we live, but the countless other worlds throughout immensity. The belief that a being of infinite wisdom and power, who with his own hand formed all the orbs and spheres that fill the vault of the universe, and who of course knew that the earth is a round ball, should talk about "laying the foundations of the earth," about stretching out the north and hanging the earth on a hook, or a peg, or nothing, and about the morning stars singing together for joy, and all that sort of thing, is extremely childish and untruthful. One cannot help marveling how a man of good intelligence can believe that such extravagant and false language could have been written or spoken by a being of infinite truth and wisdom.

I very cheerfully admit that there is a good deal of rather grand poetry and imagery in the Jewish volume and some that is really beautiful; but much of the best of it is also wild, unmeaning, and extravagant; but I cannot admit that the Jewish scriptures are any finer, any more beautiful, more moral or more true, their commandments more divine, than the scriptures of other ancient nations. Of course you are very partial to the Jewish scriptures and you can see perfection in them where I cannot, and deformities in the scriptures of other nations when they are certainly no greater than with the Jewish writers. If for the nonce it is admitted that the Jewish scriptures are a trifle better than the heathen scriptures it only proves that the Jewish poets were the ablest. It far from proves that an infinite God had anything to do with them. All books, all manuscripts, all bibles, were written by men, and no god ever wrote a word of them.

Your quotations, however, are largely from the book of Job, which I will admit to be the grandest in the Old Testament, but I deny that it is a Jewish book. It was never written by the Hebrews. Its names of persons and places are not Hebrew; it has no connection either in persons or places with any other part of the Old Testament. The person who wrote it evinced considerable knowledge of astronomy, a science of which the Hebrews were entirely ignorant. It is a poem, or a kind of drama, which has been interpolated and added to since originally

The Condition of Freethought in the United States.

[The following report by A. L. Rawson, delegate to the Brussels Freethinkers' Congress of last September, is rather late, but as the old adage says, "Better late than never," we lay it before our readers, trusting its interest will atone for its tardiness. It was translated into French and read to the Congress by Dr. De Paepe.—Ed. T. S.]

The number of the mentally free people in the United States of America is steadily increasing. Besides the hereditary tendency to belief in church dogmas and early training in the orthodox faith, the great obstacle to progress in Freethought is the fear of losing social position and business advantages. These forces hav weakened during the past twenty years more than in any similar period before, and Freethinkers hav much less to contend with now, and more people to keep them company in their opinions. One of the most efficient means of carrying on the work is the press, and next to that the lecturer. Neither the editor nor the lecturer, when advocating the cause of Freethought, has been tolerated until within a very few years just past, and they are not free from harm now, for both editors and lecturers hav been fined and imprisoned for opinion's sake within a few years.

One of your delegates in attendance here, Dr. D. M. Bennett, editor of The Truth Seeker in New York city, has only been out of prison long enough to prepare to come here, indorsed by one hundred and fifty Freethought societies.

Among the earliest journals in the cause was the Boston Investigator, established fifty years ago, and edited by Abner Kneeland. He was prosecuted for blasphemy, for having printed that "he did not believe in the same kind of God that the Universalists did," and was in prison sixty days. The paper is now edited by Horace Seaver, and is a good worker in the cause, having five thousand subscribers. Other papers advocating Freethought that were started during the next thirty years failed for want of support. The opposition to all efforts of this kind from the church party was very bitter, and is now, but while the friends were few twenty years ago, now they are many and strong, and the religious press itself feels the necessity of progress in Liberal ideas. During the last twenty years a number of journals, daily, weekly, monthly, and quarterly, hav been founded, many of which hav been successful. The Religio-Philosophical Journal, of Chicago, had a year ago a circulation of nine thousand weekly. Its editor, Mr. Bundy, made an unkind and unjust attack on a brother editor, D. M. Bennett, who was then in prison for an offense against orthodox opinion, and lost one-half of his subscribers. The Boston Index was one of the ablest journals of Freethought in America. Its editor, F. E. Abbot, was the founder of the National Liberal League in 1876, and was one of the best writers in our ranks. He was seduced by the ultra conservativs, made an attack on Mr. Bennett, lost the greater part of his subscribers, was defeated as candidate for reëlection to the presidency of the League, and was retired from the editorship of the Index. The paper was turned over to the Free Religious Association, of which Prof. Felix Adler is the president. The association represents the ultra conservativ element in the Freethought movement, and is doing good work in founding schools for boys and girls, on a secular basis, combining some of the methods of the Kindergarten. In New York it is known as the Society for Ethical Culture, and its leader and teacher (in Sunday lectures) is Prof. Felix Adler, one of the ablest men in America. The experience of these two journals should be a solemn warning to all true Freethinkers to keep a solid front to the enemy, and peace in the ranks.

The Positive Thinker, edited by Hugh Byron Brown and G. L. Henderson, was continued for about a year with very good results as to literary work. The Radical Review, edited and published by B. R. Tucker, of Boston, was a quarterly devoted to a high class of Freethought literature, but it was sustained for only one year, winning a high position as to quality. The Infidel Monthly, of Alleghany, is a moderate success. Among the weekly papers are the Seymour Times, edited by J. R. Monroe; Indianappolis Sun, edited by E. S. Pope, of Indiana; Mind and Matter, of Philadelphia, edited by J. M. Roberts, in the interest of the Spiritualists; Maurepas Gazette, of Ponchatoula, Louisiana; the Rational Appeal, of Detroit; the Mirror of Progress, of Missouri; the Western Reformer, by S. P. Davis, of Salina, Kansas; the Infidel, and the Liberal League Advocate, of Texas; the American Israelite, edited by Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, and the Frei Presse, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Der Pioneer, of Boston; Der Freidenker, of Milwaukee, Wis.; the Volks Zeitung, edited by Dr. Adolf Douai; the Staats Zeitung; the Socialist; the Jewish Times; the Hebrew Leader, of New York; the Advance, of Chicago, and a long list of other papers, scattered over the states, having each a circulation of one to five thousand, with say eight to twenty thousand readers.

The Health Monthly, of New York, edited by Dr. E. B. Foote, is a warm and able defender of our faith in humanity, and aims to regenerate by knowledge as the antidote to the curse of ignorance imposed on us by the church. The editor's wife and able assistant is a delegate to this Congress.

One of the latest journals, a weekly, founded seven years ago this month, The Truth Seeker, of New York, has a circulation of eight to ten thousand, with probably fifty thousand readers. Its proprietor and editor, D. M. Bennett, a delegate to this Congress, has suffered a year's imprisonment for his fearless attacks on orthodoxy, the chief offense being "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," in which he asked for information on some unsettled questions of fact, answers to which would hav been valuable to us all, including the church party. The only answer was persecution. The Truth, a daily paper of New York, edited by Mr. C. A. Byrne, is heartily in our cause, and strikes frequent and heavy blows at our enemies. These items show to some extent the large amount of effort that is being put forth in this one branch of the work of disseminating Freethought.

One cause why our journals are not more successful financially is that the editors of the religious press are growing more and more Liberal constantly, and that nearly every great daily or weekly secular or religious journal in the states has one or more Freethinkers on its editorial staff. The policy in all of these papers is to avoid giving offense to their subcribers and advertisers by advocating Freethinking. It is hoped that our movement will gain in strength and favor with the leaders in society so that hypocrisy will no longer be the necessary rule in business affairs.

The number of books touching on the borders of Freethought, and published by those who appear to be faithful to orthodoxy, is very large. Critical works on the Bible, in which science is brought to bear on the solution or examination of important facts or doctrins are received with favor, and hav a wide circulation. The great monthlies, Scribner's, with a list of 80,000, Harper's, with 100,000, Appleton's Journal, the Popular Science Monthly, with supplement, Demorest's Monthly, and several others with large lists of subscribers, admit articles on the subjects offered by Freethought which would hav condemned them to oblivion only a few years ago.

The leading preachers in all denominations, Catholic, Protestant, and others, of which we hav a countless host of various names, hav toned down their remarks and teachings as to Freethinkers and the doctrins of the church, so that the great divines of the generation just past would not be able to recognize their successors, either in faith or in practice. One of the most noted, Henry Ward Beecher, from Sunday to Sunday grows in broad and liberal ideas, and carries with him a very large following. His successor in the editorial chair of the Independent (a religious weekly with a very large subscription list), Dr. W. H. Ward, is a scholar, a hard student, and only now and then finds it necessary to show his colors to the orthodox camp. Twenty years ago the preachers of all kinds rounded their grandest periods with references to the unspeakable horrors or hell, but now that orthodox locality is seldom mentioned, and only in carefully finished rhetorical flourishes.

The great business houses and banking firms hav always kept a very sober face toward the church, contributing largely to its work, attending on its ministrations, working in its Sunday-schools, Bible-classes, foreign and domestic missions, reading-rooms, and other branches, and thus bidding for a share of patronage under cover of religion. The frauds, defalcations, and dishonest failures of the past twenty years, in nearly every one of which there has been found a professed Christian, as an officer or servant, in banks, savings banks, trust companies, and other depositories of the money of widows, orphans, and other poor people, hav opened the eyes of the public to the fact that Christian dogmas afford no guaranty of honor. As yet in all this enormous catalog of robbers and thieves of the money of the poor, not one leading Infidel has been caught in evil doing. It is hoped that this splendid word for honor will become the badge of the Freethinker.

The church has from the beginning in the United States had a strong hold on the politician, and through him obtained large grants of land and immense sums of money under one pretext or another. The Catholic church alone has had about nine millions of dollars out of the treasury of the city of New York within a very few years, under the pretense of supporting schools for boys and girls In the same time it has built a cathedral at an expense of nearly six millions. The Trinity Episcopalian Church in New York has real estate valued at many millions, very little of which is taxed. The Freethinkers hav urged the just measure of taxing all property for public expenses, and it will probably succeed in a year or two, some success having already been gained in several states, and the idea is favored by property owners everywhere, even in the churches.

The school system of the United States was founded when the country was unsettled and poor, many districts being unable to support a teacher unaided. In New York state every town has a so-called gospel and school lot, the revenue from which goes into the fund for public schools and poor churches. Besides this, there is exempted from taxation $1,500 of real estate for every preacher, minister, or exhorter. The sum total of such exemptions in that one state is nearly ten millions of dollars. And much of the money is used in sectarian work. The priest has always kept his guiding hand on the schools, making them the feeders of the church. A movement is now on foot, and gaining in power and favor daily, to secularize the government and the schools, thereby completely separating the church from the state in the United States. This is the special work of the National Liberal League, of which I am the secretary, and a delegate to this Congress. It had when we left the states two hundred and one auxiliaries, representing thirty-two states and territories, out of a total of forty-six now in the Union. In addition it is safe to affirm that the one hundred and ninety-eight German societies, represented here by Mr. Edward Schreuter from Sauk City, Wisconsin, are in full accord with us in our efforts to secure the success of secularism, and the general freedom of the press and of speech. The press has a nominal and a legal freedom, almost complete, but in practice it is under the domination of the church party, which watches jealously every appearance of leaning toward Freethought. Many of the great journals are owned and edited by men who are Freethinkers, and who are outspoken in private life, but whose articles in the columns of their papers are carefully guarded against giving offense to the church.

The great libraries in the country that a few years since excluded Infidel works now contain the writings of all the leading Freethinkers of Europe and America. The colleges and universities of the land were, up to within a short time since, managed by a president and faculty whose orthodoxy was unquestioned; now some of the clearest thinkers and writers of the Freethought movement are in these places. It is the rapidly-growing belief of the best men and women in the nation that life, money, property of all kinds, character, reputation, and the means of a sound education are safer in the hands of those who are not professors of the orthodox religion. The literary work done by Freethinkers during the past twenty or thirty years, in both Europe and America, far outshines in excellence and value that done by professors of religion. The average per cent of persons arrested and convicted for wrong-doing in the United States shows a very great balance in favor of the Freethinkers. The inmates of prisons are about ninety-seven per cent orthodox, and three per cent Infidel, and the occupants of the mad-houses are almost entirely from the churches.

The courts in New York, and in some other states, admit the testimony of Freethinkers, Infidels, and Atheists on simple affirmation, while still in Maryland and many other states it is excluded altogether. On jury duty the same rule applies, while in both Christians are required to appeal to God to help them to a legal standing and credence.

The legal is still behind the medical profession in the forward movement toward mental emancipation.

The doctors are with us in a great majority of cases, probably owing to their scientific education. With the three liberal professions thus favorably affected toward the movement, its ultimate success is only a question of time.

Is is said by the historians that the great mass of wealth in the Roman empire 100 B. C. became the property of about two thousand families. The tendency in the United States is toward a similar result, a few people and corporations amassing enormous wealth at the expense of the people at large, who are growing poorer, although the country was never so productiv, or the people more industrious. This state of things opens the way for the advocates of Communism, and they hav gathered a large body of workingmen into what is known as the Socialistic Labor Party. This party is already strong enough to influence the elections, and in Chicago to hav last year sent two of its number to the state legislature. They adopt and advocate our views, and may be counted as our friends, and in New York city they are an auxiliary Liberal League, known as No. 101, with about eight thousand voters.

Not many years since there was no hall devoted to the cause of the Freethinkers; now there are many, nearly every large city and town being favored with one or more. Many of these places are owned and managed by Spiritualists, who are very numerous, intelligent, and earnest, and in accord with us as to our principles of justice to all and privilege to none. Their papers are generally on our side, and very seldom attack us on any point.

The advocates of women's rights are our allies, and hav made some substantial progress toward the complete emancipation of women before the law, placing them on a legal and political equality with men, with an equal chance for education and employment. In New York a wife can own property in her own right that cannot be touched by her husband's creditors, and marriages may be legalized before witnesses, without the presence of either priest or magistrate. In the state of Wyoming women are enfranchised, and may and do hold offices, from the lowest to the highest, to which they may be elected or appointed, sitting on juries, and appearing as advocates in the courts. They are practicing law in many states, and the medical profession is honored by some very talented and successful women. They hav been admitted to study on an equality with their brothers in some colleges, and it is hoped they will soon be excluded from none; while there are colleges exclusivly devoted to the education of women, one of which is Vassar, near New York. Women are being employed as telegraph operators, book-keepers, clerks, saleswomen, agents for many kinds of mercantil business, in the fine arts of design and engraving, as editors, and in the pulpit, from nearly all of which places they were excluded only a few years ago.

The lecture field is being occupied by able and earnest workers. Only a few years ago a Freethought or Infidel lecturer stood in danger of personal violence, of prison, and was execrated as an enemy of society. It required great courage to face the storm. Now there are a goodly host of men and women in the field, whose words find a welcome and a hearty response in the hearts of thousands who hav recently been emancipated from mental bondage.

The most noted lecturer in the Freethought ranks is Robert G. Ingersoll. His speeches hav stirred the orthodox party to its very center. His spotless life, generous heart, cordial manners, brilliant wit, and learning, make it impossible to attack him, except to decry him as an Infidel, a term which now carries no sting or reproach with it, but is esteemed by us as an honorable title. Next to him is B. F. Underwood, who was lately fined, after an expensiv trial, at a cost altogether of $500 (2,500 fr.), for what was termed "immoral teaching" (as Socrates was) in a lecture delivered at Irwin's Station, in Pennsylvania. Another, W. S. Bell, of New Bedford, Massachusetts, is now under bail (as is also Dr. Bennett, Miss Josephine Tilton, and two others) awaiting trial for an offense against orthodox opinion. Other speakers are Moses Hull of Boston, Parker Pillsbury, James Parton, Horace Seaver, William Denton, O. A. Phelps, A. H. Burnham, W. F. Jamieson, J. M. Peebles, C. D. B. Mills, Henry Appleton, J. H. W. Toohey, Felix Adler, S. P. Putnam, Hugh B. Brown, T. B. Wakeman, and Courtlandt Palmer, of New York, and there is a long list of other names that might be added, including many women. Among the most talented women in the lecture field are Mrs. Laura Kendrick, Amelia H. Colby, Mrs. Clara Neymann, Lucy N. Colman, Mrs. Elizabeth M. F. Denton, Mrs. C. Fanny Allyn, Mrs. H. S. Lake, and Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol, the assistant secretary of the National Liberal League, and a delegate to this Congress. She is an accredited lecturer to the Society of Humanity of New York city, a society of Positivists, and is also charged with a mission to examin the Familistere of M. Godin, of Guise, in France, with a view to the establishment of a similar institution in the United States.

Among the writers who are most activ and effectiv in our cause are Elizur Wright, the President of the National Liberal League, T. B. Wakeman, the advocate, a vice-president, James Parton, the historian, and President of the Manhattan Liberal Club of New York, Courtlandt Palmer, T. C. Leland, Mrs. E. D. Slenker, Mrs. Sarah Underwood, Mrs. Clara Neymann, E. H. Heywood, F. E. Abbot, Parker Pillsbury, Kersey Graves, E. Campfield, E. C. Walker, J. M. Roberts, Dr. T. L. Brown, H. L. Green, and a multitude of others, each activ and useful in a special field.

The National Liberal League is the political branch of the great movement for mental emancipation. Its aim is to secure a complete separation of the church from the state, by prohibiting all appropriations of public funds for religious purposes of any kind; by discontinuing the use of chaplains in the Congress of the United States, in the army and navy, in the public schools, in the prisons; to tax all property, including churches, equally for the public expenses; to substitute simple affirmation for the judicial oath, the penalty for perjury to remain in force; to establish a practical morality and intelligence as the basis of a purely secular government; to secure an elementary education for every child, a universal education being the only safe basis for universal suffrage. The means used to carry these ideas into effect are the establishment of auxiliaries, which are generally societies of men and women who meet once a week to hear a lecture on some topic suggested by our platform, and to discuss the same, and who gather libraries, and in some cases keep a reading-room supplied with newspapers and other periodicals. The church is losing its hold on the means of education, and we hope in time to hav colleges and text-books free from its influence, and a press as free in religious as it is in political opinion, that the rising generation may be protected from the evil of a theological bias, and educated on a purely scientific basis. Our literature for the masses is stained all through with theological trash; the worst characters, the most brutal and licentious natures, are made heroes and heroins for the admiration of youth. A scientific standard of morality will sweep away these vapors that poison the intellectual atmosphere, and relieve us of the germs of mental diseases that now so greatly increase the burdens of society.

I bring you, members of this Congress, from the land of Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and Thomas Paine, a greeting of brotherly and sisterly fraternity and sympathy in the great and good work for the mental emancipation of humanity.

A. L. RAWSON, Delegate.

Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets. By Rev. S. Baring-Gould. New York, D. M. Bennett. Price, $1.50.

DEAR BENNETT: I hav enjoyed the reading of this book ever so much. The old legends are such faithful transcripts of the minds of men in the old, old days, showing how a belief in the marvelous and wonderful permeated all classes and all races only a few thousand years ago, and proving that the Christian and Jewish Bible is only a later version of those same old stories toned down into a little more of a semblance to reality and believableness, and proving that in one more thousand years they will doubtless be eliminated entirely from what is now termed God's divine and holy revelation. Indeed, many scholars are now proposing to drop much of the Old Testament in the coming revision, for they see it is as useless and improbable as are these legends of Gould.

I will giv a few brief sketches of some of these, for I am sure thy readers will only need a taste of what is prepared for them to feast upon to make them desire a full meal. One of these legends says that the devil told Eve that by eating of the forbidden fruit she would enjoy perpetual youth and beauty, so she believed and ate. It was a wheat-tree, and had leaves like emeralds, "the ears were red as rubies, and the grains white as snow, sweet as honey and fragrant as musk. Eve ate a grain, and found it more delicious than anything she had hitherto tasted, so she gave a second grain to Adam. Adam resisted for a whole hour (an hour in Paradise was eighty years); but when he saw that Eve remained well and cheerful he yielded to her persuasions and ate of the second grain which Eve had offered him daily, three times a day, for the eighty years. Thereupon all Adam's heaven-given raiment fell from him, his crown slipped off his head, his rings dropped from his fingers, his silken garments glided like water from his shoulders, and he and Eve were naked and unadorned, and their fallen garments reproached them with the words, 'Great is your misfortune! Long will be your sorrows! We were created to adorn those who serve God. Farewell till the resurrection.' Then they were sent from Paradise." Now I think this is a much prettier story than the bare, dry record of Genesis, and full as liable to be true.

"When God created Adam he breathed into him grace and illumination and a ray of the holy spirit; but when he sinned this glory left him, and his face became clouded, and he became the father of Cain and Abel. But afterward 'he begat a son in his own likeness, after his image, and he called his name Seth,' meaning resurrection, because in him he saw the resurrection of his departed beauty and wisdom and glory and the radiance of the holy spirit. And when men saw how the face of Seth shone with divine light and heard him speak with divine wisdom they said, 'He is God.' Therefore his sons were commonly called the sons of God. Seth was an Egyptian sun-god, hence the myth of his shining face."

"When the angels promised Sarah a son, they also gave her back her youth and beauty. On the day the child was born the blind saw, the dumb spake, the deaf heard, the lame walked, and the crazed recovered their senses; also the sun shone forty-eight times brighter than he shines at midsummer. When the sons of Israel drank the powdered golden calf, whoever had given thereunto any trinket of gold, the sign of it came forth upon his nostrils, and those who had kissed the idol were marked with gilt lips, and the Levites were thus enabled to distinguish them, and slew of them twenty and three thousand."

Speaking of the grapes in Eshkal, a legend says, "The strongest camel is scarcely able to carry one bunch of grapes." And it also says: "One ear of corn in that land yields enough to feed a whole family, and one pomegranate-shell could contain five armed men, and the inhabitants were in keeping with the productions of the soil. We saw men the smallest of whom was six hundred cubits high, and their houses are also in proportion—walled up to heaven so that an eagle could hardly soar above them, and we appeared as locusts before them."

Zami, son of Ezechiel, speaking of the fruitfulness of the holy land, says he saw goats feeding under fig-trees, and the milk flowed from their udders, and the honey dropped from the figs, and the two mingled in one stream. Then he said, "This is the land promised to our forefathers—flowing with milk and honey."

Rabbi Jacob says, "In the morning twilight I started on my way, and I was over ankles in honey out of the figs." Others tell of a stream of milk and honey "sixteen miles long and of the same breadth."

Now these tales are only versions of the bunch of grapes borne on the shoulders of two of the children of Israel that we hav all seen pictured out, and the dwindling of said grapes will continue till the tale becomes only of a reasonable largeness.

The stories of the giant Og are mere specimens of the exaggeration of the ancients. "At one meal Og ate a thousand oxen and as many wild roes, and his drink was a thousand firkins; and one drop of the sweat from his brow weighed thirty-six pounds." Of his size Rabbi Johanan says: "I was once a grave-digger. I ran after a deer, and went in at one end of the shin-bone of a dead man, and I ran for three miles, and could not catch the deer or reach the end of the bone. . . . It was the shin-bone of Og, king of Bashan. . . . The sole of his foot was forty miles long. Once when he was quarreling with Abraham one of his teeth fell out, and Abraham made a bed out of the tooth. Og built sixty cities, and the smallest was sixty miles high."

"David had such a beautiful voice that when he sang the praises of God birds came from all quarters and surrounded him, listening to the strains, and the mountains and hills were moved at his notes. He could sing as loud as thunder, or as sweetly as the tuneful nightingale."

Solomon was fond of feeding the poor. Meats were placed on tables that covered four square miles; and "one dav when spirits, men, beasts, and birds all rose satisfied, Solomon besought God to permit him to feed to the full all created animals at once; but God told him it was an impossibility, and that he should first try the dwellers of the sea. Then came all manner of fishes to the surface of the water, and Solomon cast corn to them, and they ate and were satisfied, and dived out of sight; but all at once a whale lifted its head above the surface, and it was like a mountain. One sack of corn after another was poured down the throat of the monster till all the store was exhausted, and the whale still cried: 'Feed me, Solomon, feed me! Never before hav I suffered from hunger as I hav this day!' Then Solomon asked the whale if there were any more like him in the deep. The fish answered, 'There are of my race as many as a thousand kinds, and the smallest is so large that thou wouldst seem in its belly to be but a sand grain in the desert.' . . . Then came up a leviathan so great that it could hav swallowed seven thousand whales such as that which Solomon had attempted to feed, and the leviathan cried, with a voice like thunder, 'Praised be God, who, by his mighty power, preserves me from perishing by hunger.'"

Of course this showed Solomon the impossibility of feeding all the hungry. There are many more of these pretty legends I would like to giv our TRUTH SEEKER readers; but I hope all who admire these I hav selected will want the rest, and giv to thee thy due need of encouragement for publishing one more Bible-destroying volume, for who can read all these versions of the holy legends and believe ours true and all the rest fables?

"Long the night of superstition wrapped the earth with gloom;
Now the glorious rays of reason shall her vales illume.
Slowly, surely, brightly, grandly spreads the glorious light,
Harbinger of all that's precious, freedom, truth, and right."

Respectfully, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

The Throne and the Power Behind the Throne.

Some time ago, be the same more or less, a set of politicians in want of a stalking-horse to get behind and run the government machines, pick up a Nazarene, mount him on a donkey, ride him into Jerusalem, and hail him "king of the Jews." Another set of politicians, the reverends, upset the scheme.

Centuries later, reverend politicians dig up the ghost of the Nazarene, hail him God, and run the machine over a large share of this little planet.

Another set of politicians, in want of a stalking-horse, take the great Mr. Grant, ride him around the world, in hope, by nullification of Lex non Scripta, to make him military majesty, with dynasty. This, like the donkey excursion, is a failure.

With increased facilities of intercommunication we hav increased mental expansion. Politics and theologies of the past, however good in their day, are fast subsiding.

Liberals, infidel to effete theologies, talk of sending TRUTH SEEKER man around the world. Is it to proclaim a new gospel, our divinest ideal of the true dignity of humanity?

The think is parent of the feel, and grandparent of the act.

Place a double guard at the think. Humanity takes its initiativ low down in the scale of being. We must ascend, by slow and toilsome education, to the transparency of the seraphim and cherubim of the more advanced heavens. Respectfully,

AMEN.

written, and was probably borrowed by the Jews from the heathens of Babylon when there in captivity, and was incorporated among their writings long after their return. They had no canon before.

You also quote a good deal from the Psalms, which are a heterogeneous collection of the aspirations and poetic fancies of a diversity of individuals wholly unknown, much the same as a modern song-book or hymn-book is made up of the productions of the miscellaneous writings of various authors. There is not the slightest proof that David ever wrote a word of them, and they would be no better if the unprincipled libertine, bloody murderer, and lecherous adulterer wrote every word of them. It is very certain that the larger portion of them was not written until five hundred years after the time of David.

What are called the Proverbs of Solomon are untruthfully named. It is barely possible that Solomon may have used some of them, but there is no probability that he is the author of them. They are a collection of the sage sayings and maxims of several nations. Many of the proverbs are of heathen origin, and no more sacred than the proverbs of the Spanish, the Turks, or the wise saws of "Poor Richard's Almanac."

You must certainly have a vivid imagination to find so much grandeur, beauty, truth, purity, and morality in those old Jewish writings, or to find anything in them not wholly within the human power to produce. I cannot find a chapter, a verse, nor a sentence not entirely within the power of intelligent men to write, and no inherent proof that it was penned by the hand of an infinite God. It seems to be extremely foolish and unwarranted to ascribe to a divine being the authorship of that which man is fully capable of producing. When writings are found which possess more wisdom, beauty, and truth than man has ever evinced, it is time enough to imagine that a god must have done it; but until we find that character of composition we had better let the gods rest.

In quoting your proofs of the divinity, purity, and morality of the Bible, you seem to carefully shun several conspicuous parts of it which by a person not possessing extraordinary reverence for pretended divine things cannot be accepted as specially pure or specially moral. Why did you omit to quote the account of Noah's getting drunk and lying on the floor of his tent, in a prolonged debauch, with his person indecently exposed?

Why did you omit the account of the godly Abraham, the Father of the Faithful, living a life of adultery with his handmaid Hagar, by whom he had his son Ishmael, who, with the mother, he drove into the wilderness to perish; and about his going into Egypt and Gerar and lying about Sarah, denying that she was his wife, and trading off her charms for cattle, sheep, and gold?

How is it that you did not tell us about righteous Lot, the only really good moral man in a whole city, and whose righteousness was nearly enough to save it from destruction; how on different occasions he indulged extravagantly in strong drink, and held the most criminal incestuous intercourse with his two virgin daughters, after Mrs. Lot had been salted down? Do you think a man so badly intoxicated as to be unconscious of what he was doing could perform those deeds? Can you imagine the inhabitants of Sodom did much worse than this? In our day such black crime would send a man to prison for twenty years.

Why did you not tell about the pious Jacob, the father of the twelve tribes of Israel; about his swindling his elder brother; about his cheating his old blind daddy, as well as his old father-in-law, wronging him out of his live stock by a sharp Jew trick; about his life of polygamy and concubinage; about his going in unto his housemaids, and about his many dishonest and dishonorable deeds?

Why did you not tell about Dinah, the daughter of Leah, lying adulterously with Shechem and being defiled by him?

Why did you not quote the amorous episode of Reuben's fornication with his father's concubine?

Why did you not with pious unction call my attention to the holy act of Judah cohabiting with Tamar on the highway, supposing she was a harlot?

Why did you not tell the interesting story of Mrs. Potiphar trying to seduce the innocent virgin Joseph?

Why did you not allude to the fact of Moses, whom Yahweh chose for his prime minister, grand vizier, and general adviser, being a murderer, and about his directing Yahweh's chosen people to lie and steal?

Why did you not quote some of the beautiful laws of Moses, about the females whose nakedness should not be uncovered, and whose might be, about how many days women should be unclean after their having their courses; about the seed of copulation escaping; about cohabiting with beasts; about incest with mothers, sisters, daughters, cousins, and aunts; about God's holy way of having his priests test the women of the congregation with holy water to ascertain if they had lain with men on the sly; about the various unclean issues of blood and semen, and about carrying a paddle attached to the weapons for the purpose of covering excrement when voided? There undoubtedly is holiness in all those things.

Why did you not describe the flagrant fornication between Zimri and Cozbi in sight of all the congregation, when the good but indignant Phineas ran them through with a javelin while in the very act? Are not those moral lessons profitable to repeat?

Why did you not tell us about the command of God by Moses to slay in cold blood all the women of a whole nation, all the male children, including infants, of a whole nation, and to keep all the virgin maidens and all the little girls for the use of the murderers? Is it not good to recall such instances of the Lord's holiness and mercy?

Why did you not bring to my mind some of the bloody deeds of General Joshua in destroying the cities of Canaan, putting thousands of men, women, and children to death by the sword, who had done nothing to injure him?

Why not a word about the pious Levite and his concubine stopping over night in Gibeah, who when beset by the wicked inhabitants shamefully turned his concubine to them, and they outraged her all night to the extent that she fell dead at the door? Are not such recitals very appropriate reading for Sunday-school children of both sexes?

Why not say a little about that good girl Ruth falling in love with her cousin Boaz and secretly crawling into bed with him at night?

Why not tell what was the matter with Hannah that she was childless, and how Yahweh cured her?

Why not a word or two about that holy man David, the man after God's own heart; about his heavenly zeal in dancing naked before the ark; about his coveting Abagail, the wife of the farmer Nabal, who soon conveniently died, when David righteously took to his own habitation the widow he had fallen in love with; about his various other wives and concubines; about his spying from the roof of his house the beautiful Bathsheba when she was taking an evening bath and his commanding her to be brought to his apartments; about his adulteries with her and his then causing her husband, the honest Uriah, to be put to death that he might have the wife wholly to himself; how when after a long life of bloodshed, adultery, polygamy, concubinage, and crime, when he had no longer much heat or vigor, that a beautiful young damsel, Abishag, was sought out for him, to sleep with him and cherish him and lie in his bosom? Are not all the deeds of such a holy man, such a favorite of God, proper to be named, so that a correct estimate of the purity and morality of the book may be formed?

Why did you not mention about David's son Absalom cohabiting with his father's concubines on the housetop in the sight of the whole people?

Why not repeat the moral sensational story of another son and daughter of David, Amnon and Tamar, about his deceiving her by pretending to be ill, and then seizing and raping her in a most criminal manner, and against her touching entreaties?

Why not something about the wise and favored Solomon, who was permitted to build a most magnificent temple to God, and about his seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, and how often he was able to make his marital circuit? Is it not beautiful for you to dwell on the holy deeds of the holy men of such a holy book?

Why did you not sing the pure and holy love songs of this same Solomon, wherein he recounts the charms and beauties of his beloved, the various portions of her body which he so passionately admired, with the amorous desires which swelled his bosom? Have they not an exquisite air of purity and morality surpassing the sacred writings of all other nations?

Why not repeat the story of the prostitution of Queen Esther and of the shameful connection between Ahasuerus and herself?

Why not give us more of the words of the holy prophets, not omitting the zealous Ezekiel wherein he instructed the people to mix their cakes with human excrement?

Why not repeat the amorous imagery of his sixteenth chapter? Why not the chaste and pure language of the twenty-second and twenty-third chapters, which, for $500, you could not be hired to read before a mixed audience of ladies and gentlemen? Do you think any of the heathen bibles have anything equal to this?

But I must not dwell too long on these beauties and purities; there are too many of them, and space is too scarce to mention half of them. There is Hosea and his whoredoms and his whore-wife, and the uncounted adulterers alluded to by him and the other Bible writers; there is the matter of the interview between Yahweh and the Virgin Mary when Jesus was begotten; about the woman who was caught in the very act of adultery and taken to Jesus for judgment, etc., etc., and much, much else of a similar pure and holy character, but you did not allude to them, and I will not take the space to do so. But I think the candid verdict must be that in this line of pure, moral, and ethical culture, the Jewish scriptures are quite beyond any of the heathen bibles; and that another revision of the Jewish scriptures is badly needed, in which all the nasty, filthy, and indecent parts of it, amounting to nearly half the volume, should be thoroughly expurgated. It does no one any good to read such stuff; and instead of attributing it to God, it ought to be ascribed, truthfully, to coarse, crude men.

I intended in this letter to have closed my quotations from the moral teachers of the pagan nations before Jesus; but I have taken so much space to reply to your remarks about the great designer, and to help you to point out the beauties, the purity, and morality of the Jewish scriptures, that I will again have to lay it over to my next. Perhaps you will feel inclined to lead off on the other subjects we have yet to consider. Yours truly, D. M. B.

MANCOS, COL., May 23, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Referring to my registered letter of May 20, containing inclosed $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I herewith forward to you the promised $5 for traveling expenses. Yours, WM. WELLS.

HORTON, MICH., May 26, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $5 promised for your trip round the world. Wishing you a safe journey and return, believe me to be very truly

Yours, ISAAC THORP.

CASEY, IOWA, May 29, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed post-office order for $5, my promis to you for your trip round the globe, and if you do not go I will hav $3 placed to my credit on THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the remaining $2 I will take out in some good book; for instance, "Antichrist." Yours with much respect, and hoping you will hav a safe journey,

JAMES W. HAGER.

BUSHNELL, ILL., June 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed $5 for your trip round the world. You hav my best wishes, and I hope will hav a pleasant trip.

Yours, DWIGHT WARREN.

SAN JOSE, CAL., May 27, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: God bless you; they who are for you are more than they who are against you, and my heart is glad to see THE TRUTH SEEKER growing daily in circulation and power. Before I return from my trip West you will be away on your mission for the people. But many hearts in their good wishes for your success and safe return will go with you.

With sincere regard for you and yours, I am for truth, Yours truly, DR. J. L. YORK.

PINEVILLE, GA., May 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I now inclose the $5 for circumnavigation. Hope you may get plenty to carry you through. If you get out while you are gone let me know through THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can send you $5 or $10 more. I hope you may hav a pleasant, happy time and return safe and sound and find Comstock in the penitentiary when you return. I will get you a dozen subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER this fall. I will send you a new subscriber or two soon. If you do not get off, just credit me with $3 and use the other $2. My love to you and wife.

Yours fraternally, W. F. MOLDER.

GOULDSMITH, IND., May 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5.00 to be applied to the fund for traveling around the world.

There are some who think you should stay at home; I say Go, and giv true and impartial information of the Old World as you see it,

There is certainly enough left at home to take care of that hellion, Comstock, and his crew.

Yours respectfully, DAVID SMITH.

ELK GROVE, CAL., May 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been much interested in your contemplated trip around the world, and now send you $5.00 to aid in said trip and to get the book. Hoping you will hav a pleasant trip and a safe return, I remain, Yours, A. H. SIMONS.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., May 31, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is a postal order for $5.00 as promised, for your circuit around this earth. Wishing you a pleasant and profitable journey; hoping you may return and enjoy the society of your wife and many friends in the United States is the wish of your ever constant friend, ISAAC VAN SCHOICK.

GEORGETOWN, COL., May 28, 1881.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER; As you hav decided to take the long journey round the world, you will please find inclosed $5.00, as per agreement. Our best wishes for your health and safe return.

Comstock & Co. hav not yet retired from their mean business and I fear when you hav left they will set to work and exclude our dear TRUTH SEEKER from the mails. Truth is very obnoxious to some people. Yours. MRS. T. S. OLD.

MANISTE , June 3, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I see that the "V's" come dropping in slowly and that you are going to see the sights. Well, please accept my mite with the rest. I hope all those who hav pledged will "whack up" so that you can see all that there is to be seen. Should you go to the Holy Land (and of course you will), and should you see where God walked in the garden, look for the tracks, and send me a little piece of bark from that tree that has caused so much trouble. I won't ask for any more, for you will hav your grip-sack full of relics. So, hoping good health and spirit friends may accompany you, and your stamps hold out, I remain, Yours for truth and right,

CHAS. J. PECK.

WEST UNION, June 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Am glad that you hav concluded to make the trip around the world. Inclosed is $11.00; $5.00 for Thomas Reeder, and $5.00 for myself, as promised, for the book that will liv forever, and $1.00 for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to a new subscriber. J. F. SMITH.

CLYDE, OHIO, June 1, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I hav gained more information by reading THE TRUTH SEEKER the past three years than I ever did by all the reading I ever did in my life.

D. WHITE.

MUSCATINE, May 26, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed is $5.00 for the trip around the world, wishing you a safe journey and a glorious return. In case you should be short of the needful I am willing to bear my share of the balance needed, but go. I think we all will enjoy the trip with you. Yours respectfully, CHAS. SEIENDEIKER.

DEAR FRIEND: I am pleased to learn you are nearly ready to start around the world, I think we will get many truths from the so-called heathen nations that hav been kept back by our very pious missionaries. Success to you; safe return home. Then I hope to hav the pleasure of welcoming you and my esteemed brother, Col. R. G. Ingersoll (whom I think the greatest orator in America), at my home in the land of flowers. Please find inclosed $5.00 for your trip around world and $5.00 for Ingersoll's lectures. remit at once. Truly, R. A. HARDEN.

NELSON, KAN., May 26, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed is postal order for $5.00 to make good my promis. Hoping you may hav a pleasant trip and an instructiv one to your readers. I remain, Your well-wisher, WM. B. BRISLINE.

CAWKER CITY, KAN., June 1, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed is postal order for $5.00 for around the world. If the names of the subscribers are to be printed in your book, you will please put in the name of B. I. Vandament, who was born on the 7th of May. The B. is for your name and the I. for Ingersoll. May you liv to return. D. G. VANDAMENT.

EUREKA, CAL., May 21, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: For several weeks my paper has remained unopened, my time being occupied between work and sleep. Yet, anxious to find out whether or not you would make the journey round the world, I opened the paper of May 7th this morning and found almost on first sight that you had concluded to go. Inclosed you will find money order for the amount promised.

You can hav no idea how I long to go along with you! I am passionately fond of traveling, and also I should like to travel in your company, for I know of no man who can combine pleasure with business better than you can. I am more after the Volney pattern. I love to see sights and then sit down and meditate upon what I hav seen. But as it is foolish to foster a desire which cannot be gratified, I will content myself at present with the pleasure of reading your letters from abroad and picturing in my mind's eye the places and scenes which some day I hope to see myself. Hoping that health and happiness may attend you wherever you go, I remain,

Yours fraternally, ROBERT GUNTHER.

BISMARCK, DAK. TER., May 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav just received my paper of the 7th, and I see by it that it is a sure thing that you will take the contemplated trip round the world. Therefore you will find inclosed $8—$5 for the trip and $3 to apply on my subscription, which will pay for the same up to November 1, 1882. Let others go and do likewise. I think it would be somewhat of a comfort to you when on the opposit side to think that all your subscribers hav paid in advance till your return, thereby making THE TRUTH SEEKER a sure thing, and when you return that you would not be in debt as it was before. I wish it was so you could come this way. When you get back we will hav to send you and Mrs. Bennett through the states, for we want "An Infidel at Home" as well as abroad. But there i time enough yet. S. G. SHARPLESS.

SALEM, IOWA, June 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for the book or books of your travels round the world. I see by my last TRUTH SEEKER that some one wants you to fetch home a little god; but I implore you, for humanity's sake, not to do it, for this country, like Italy, is overstocked with gods. Yours, F. D. SHELDEN.

WILSONVILLE, ., May 27, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: So you hav conclu .ed to risk that long and perilous journey round God's football! Take with thee my best wishes. I am sorry I cannot giv more substantial help than wishes. I will inclose $5 pledged, and would like to make it $500 if I could. I could not persuade any of my friends to subscribe for thy travels. I am greatly obliged for the pamphlet sent me. I hope you will not find worse enemies among the heathens than you hav found among the Christians, and that you may discover and divulge truths that hav been carefully withheld from us by the Christians, and that your trip may be otherwise every way successful, and that you may return in safety to take your old place and open forth the batteries of thunder at the strongholds of superstition until the battle of liberty is won.

Yours for the cause, SAMUEL B. CLARK.

CANTON, KAN., May 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed is $5.00, my pledge toward your trip around the world.

Hoping you will hav a pleasant and ultimately a paying trip, I am, as ever, Yours, C. W. STOWE.

CLEBURN, TEXAS, May 22, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for $10 for the trip round the world.

My best wishes for you and yours, M. M. HAYLER.

THE DALLES, OR, May 23, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hasten to forward the $5 for the trip round the world. I think I shall be able to sell one or more copies of the book when published. May you hav a safe and pleasant journey, not forgetting to visit friends and disciples throughout the United States also, is the wish of Yours fraternally, MRS. A. EVEREST.

MEMPHIS, TEN., June 2, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I inclose postal order for $8, of which $3 is to pay for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER to Dec. 31, 1881, and $5 for the book you propose to giv us of your voyage round the world, or to Asia, China, India, wherever it is you are going. I wish you a pleasant journey and a safe and speedy return. Respectfully, MINOR MERRIWETHER.

TRIPOLI, IOWA, May 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: About a week ago I inclosed $5 to assist you in navigating this little globe of ours. I now send you $8 from M. F. Gillett, of Tripoli, Bremen county, Iowa—$5 to aid you in your mission in foreign lands (of course he wants the books), and $3 for a renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Respectfully, D. P. WALLING.

ANOKA, MINN., May 13, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I will inclose six dollars with Mr. John Kinsee—five dollars for world trip and one for continuance of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully, G. H. FAIRBANKS.

JAMESPORT, MO., May 31, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: You hav asked the advice of your friends concerning the trip, but as there are many more intelligent than myself I will withhold for the present. I wish you speed and health on the long trip. If you pass by where Lot's wife was turned into salt, I wish you would bring me a few grains of that wonderful pillar. I hope you will not look back and share the fate of Lot's wife.

Go, old hero, with thy banners unfurled,
And proclaim truth and knowledge to the world.

Respectfully, MILTON EADS.

PAYNESVILLE, MISSOURI, May 25, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $9—$5 for the trip round the world, as per agreement, and the remainder for the books named. E. A. TOWNSLEY.

OMIO, KANSAS, May 28, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office order for $8—$3 for the paper and $5 for the trip round the world. My best wishes go with you. There are lots of Freethinkers out here, but no organization. I must hav the paper. Yours, H. KEELY.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., May 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose, as promised, $5 toward the trip round the world. I am also willing to pay pro rata to hav the books nicely illustrated. I trust you will hav a good time. J. B. BURGES.

MORRISANIA, N. Y., May 31, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find check for the sum of $8—$3 for the paper for one year and $5 for the trip round the world. I hope you will hav a pleasant trip. Respectfully yours, JAMES L. PARSHALL.

MADISON, OHIO, May 25, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money order for $8—$5 for the trip round the world and $3 for the paper for one year. Thanks for your photo; it came all right. Yours, with many good wishes for your safe return. MRS. SILAS HILL.

HARVARD, ILL., April 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed post-office order for $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav taken the paper since you started it in Illinois, and I must say it advocates some of the soundest and best views, to my mind, that I ever read; and to think how you hav been persecuted for advocating such noble and elevating principles as you hav! It is a shame, and I think that such a man as Anthony Comstock ought to be despised by every decent man in America. He has at the present time too much power given him, and yet he is asking for more. It seems to me that if such a miserable sneak was in Illinois his influence would be very small. I said sneak, and if there is any other name that would make him meaner than he is, just that. Now, friend Bennett, if you take that trip round the world, publish it in THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I hav five dollars for you, and ten rather than you should fail to go. I read your letters from Europe, and they were very interesting.

Yours with respect. ABRAM CARMACK.

JOSEPH, OR., April 30, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: After having seen in your paper of April 2d a call from a Liberal colony at Valley Falls, Kansas, for a communication from some one either in Washington Territory or Oregon interested in the project of forming a Liberal colony, I will say that I earnestly believe a better country than the Willowa Valley, in Union county, Or., could not be found on the Pacific coast. It is a new valley. Chief Joseph's tribe was driven from it but two years ago. I am now residing at Joseph (the town was named for the chief). It is a small place, situated on the north side of a range of snow-covered mountains, and is but a mile north of a beautiful lake. This lake is certainly the most lovely body of water my eyes ever chanced to gaze on. It appears to the eye as still as death and as clear as a crystal. It is a mile wide and four miles long, affording excellent skating in winter and splendid boating in summer. Nothing but a Bayard Taylor's pen could describe this lake. The valley is settling up very rapidly, and those with but little means can get a start here. With the exception of my own family, there are no Liberals here, so we offer every honest inducement to Liberals to come to this valley. Those desiring to make any inquiries in regard to this valley will please address Prof. W. J. Dean, Joseph, Willowa Valley, Union county, Or. Yours, C. B. D.

LOCK BERLIN, N. Y., June 14, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav come to the conclusion that the Bible was written by man instead of by an omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient being, and the sayings and doings of it are pernicious and not fit to be read by or taught to the youth. By reason of reading it and observation of the the sayings and doings of mankind, I hav thrown off all allegiance to it and the Christian religion, therefore you may enroll my name on the banner of Freethought and reform. There is a number that think and believe about as I do, but hav not the moral courage to cast off the bloody religion of superstition and ignorance.

Mr. Bennet, since I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER (by borrowing it), I hav made up my mind that it is better to guide and direct me in the paths of duty toward my family and man. You may write my name on your subscription list for ever; certainly while it is edited under your supervision. Before my time expires I will hav some more money. I am yours for liberty and Freethought,

TYLER ADAMS.

A Sonnet to Progress.

BY ANNIE E. DE FRIESE.

All things to one bright end are swiftly going;
Old superstitions totter to their graves;
Customs which we hav knelt to, and whose slaves
Blindly devoted were we, fast are flowing
Into oblivion, scarcely one bestowing
A thought to stay them, lest again they rise
And overwhelm man's higher destinies.
Depotic prejudice melts like a mist
Before the radiance of the advancing light;
And children of the sires who confest
The slavish bond of creeds, strike with their might
The galling fetters that hav long opprest
Thought's liberty within the human breast.
And Truth springs from the soil where Error dies.

Tamar.

BY ALHAZA.

He peeped through the lattice: what heaven could it mar
To dream in its precincts, if gates are ajar?
She woke from a slumber as balmy as dew,
And midnight its carcanet over her threw.
Too dark: then he made her eyes glimmer like pearls,
And dyed her pure cheek, but the rivers of curls
Fell dripping and floating, all heavy and chill,
On the silvery breast, as they wandered at will,
And Ammon's wild heart felt the strange, viewless thrall
Of a rose that hath whitened a funeral pall.

"I move not, I breathe not; how crimson thy lip!
I see a weird humming-bird hov'ring to sip.
The wind stoopeth down from the dark, moaning trees
And waves a rich censer. I shiver, I freeze;
My locks are all drenched with the dews of the night.
A spirit that whispers of famin and blight
Inhabits my heart, and I hurry to thee.
Oh, make me a loaf that is comely to see,
All golden and spicy, with power to charm
Away from this bosom the poisons that harm.
Will the wind never cease from its wail of despair?
I weary and sink with a burden of fear."

She smileth—the roses of Sharon wax pale,
That climb o'er the lattice. "What pitiful ail
Hath stirred thy dark soul? I must rise then to make
A rich golden loaf, for thy ravenous sake.
No ravens are wilder, that swoop near the door
To carry a crust to the righteous and poor."
Then she passeth the door, and the scented wind moaneth,
The monkshood doth shriek, and the dragon-fly groaneth;
How pale is the jasmin! the myrtle is dying.
The lightning leaped down from a brown beetling cloud,
And sheeted the maiden with cere-cloth and shroud.
Her cheeks were all blanched as she kneaded the cake,
And the wolf hovered near. Would the sky for her sake
Stoop downward and rescue the sweet moaning lamb?
The wild, shrieking blast—will it never grow calm?
No; the heavens are all brazen and providence dead,
And night-voices weep, but the gods are as lead,
The moonbeams are faint, and rich odors are dying,
From the sweet, sultry South saddest whispers replying,
Then months swept along in a passionate flood,
Till spice-cakes were steeped in a dark pool of blood.

What Must We Do to Be Saved?

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Oh, what is this blood-curdling rumor I hear,
Which filleth my soul with terrible fear?
Lo! the church publishes this dread proclamation,
"All unbelievers will suffer damnation!"

A victim of terror, my mind is enslaved,
So I cry, "What must I do to be saved?"
"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ," is replied,
"To save you from hell he suffered and died."

To prove who is Christ four gospels they show,
Which I must believe, or to hell I will go.
I open its leaves; no more will I grieve,
For soon will I know what I've got to believe.

I read of his birth and family line,
To King David back like a beautiful vine;
And Matthew and Luke—how nice they agree!
Oh, dash the luck, no! Luke givs forty-three,

While Matthew just only givs twenty-eight.
This tax on my faith is fearfully great.
That twenty-eight equals forty-three just
I cannot believe—I'll be damned if I must.

"No need for to do it," my parson exclaims,
"For don't you see they are different names,
Between the two lines there's nothing contrary,
For one is for Joseph, the other for Mary;

"But both end with Joe, and with David begin,
That shows, my dear friends, your reason is thin.
If carefully weighed, any simpleton knows
There easy could be a couple of Joes."

"And both the husband of Mary?" I said,
"And then take the ghost of another to bed,
And still stay a maid—how can this be true?
I cannot believe it, so what shall I do?

Of two or three children a man may be sire,
This I can believe with no threats of fire.
How can a child hav three sires, do you know?
One called a ghost, and a couple called Joe?

"I take a Joe back," my parson replies,
"I've made by haste these things appear lies."
Then Joe's fixed; the same, two fathers has he,
And Jacob and Heli they certainly be.

'Twixt Matthew and Luke, to which shall I hold?
Both cannot be right by reas I'm told,
If Matthew is right with his Jacob, then why
Luke must hav blundered, or may be (Heli) he lie.

"This is all trifling, so drop it, my friend;
'Tis nothing important, however it end.
Have faith that Christ died on the cross for your sake.
For just on this point salvation's at stake."

"If my belief at the starting-point fail.
How can I hav faith in the end of the tale?
And lacking this faith, my death-warrant rings,
For I can't believe the very first things."

"Cease, ye Infidel, cease; I see very plain
That you hav imbibed the notions of Paine,
And you will be damned if that is the case;
Where vile reason rules faith cannot find place."

This gleam of suspicion then dawned on my mind,
'Twas all a job put up by priests on mankind—
A hue and cry raised that all will be damned
Unless the priest's pockets with money are crammed.

Then I think a better salvation to know
Is to keep from wronging our brothers below;
To cease from all cruelty, wrangling, and strife;
To shun all the crimes and evils of life.

To humanity love, to gods bid farewell,
Nor fuddle our brains with heaven or hell,
And diligently, honestly, treasure up pelf,
And let the next world take care of itself.

One world at a time. Liv lovingly here,
And we'll fare very well if another appear.
Let truth and love in our souls be engraved,
And we need make no fuss about getting saved.

A Wonderful Expose! 4t25

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case; and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

Important to Invalids. The Most Marvelous Invention in the World

THE "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING
IS THE DESPAIR OF NOSTRUM VENDERS AND ADVERTISED QUACKERY.

The steam engin and electric telegraph are as nothing compared with the wonder-working nature of the "WILSONIA." Under its influence disease can hav no place in our nature.

The Paralyzed are being made perfectly well.
Rheumatic patients are perfectly restored.
Varicose veins disappear as if by magic.
Fever cannot be where the "WILSONIA" is worn.
Asthma, Bronchitis, and all Pulmonary Diseases are being cured by the thousand.

CITIZENS OF AMERICA!

If you love your country and the welfare of the human race, make yourselvs acquainted at once with WILLIAM WILSON'S Marvelous Invention. Inquiry will cost you nothing.

Our depots are open free for inspection toall classes of society. Physicians and Scientists are specially invited to inspect my "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, and they will, on application to me, be referred to THREE THOUSAND PERSONS in the city of Brooklyn alone w o hav been thoroughly cured.

INVALIDS OF AMERICA!

In the name of high heaven, abándon all forms of drug treatment and become perfectly healthy men and women. Call or send your friends to inspect my invention and satisfy yourself of the marvelous results following its use. Depots will be found as follows:

BROOKLYN—465 Fulton Street.
NEW YORK—695 Broadway, near Grand Central Hotel.
JERSEY CITY—55 Montgomery Street.

"AND EVER THE RIGHT COMES UPPERMOST AND EVER IS JUSTICE DONE."

The above quotation, to be found in the poem of McKay, was never better illustrated than in the marvelous results following the introduction of the "WILSONIA" Belts and Magnetic Clothing.

The selfish blunderheads of the faculty of Brooklyn hav now had their ignorance exposed in the marvelous cures now counted by the thousand in the city of Brooklyn alone, and all within the short space of six months.

READ THE MARVELOUS TESTIMONY OF LIVING WITNESSES IN THE CITY OF BROOKLYN HERETO APPENDED.

would first note the case of Peter Lehlback, whose testimony is given below. This poor man will tell you that fifty-four of the best physicians of Jersey City and New York had utterly failed to giv him the slightest relief. Myself hearing of his lamentable case, determined to dress him in my Magnetic Garments without any money being paid. I put on him $130 worth of my clothing, and while my assistant was dressing the man one of these blunderhead physicians had the audacity to attempt to intimidate Peter Lehlback from wearing them, wickedly remarking to the invalid as follows:

"Well, Lehlback, I thought you had more sense than to put on such rags."

However, this pampered dogmatist's only support is the privileged consonants "M.D." placed at the end of his name; and in his case, as in thousands of others, these same consonants take the place of brains. But let us see the result.

This same fool, calling upon Peter Lehlback one week after wearing the goods, found him walking without crutches; and even then the wicked character of the man was evidenced in the following soliloquy:

"Ah, well, Lehlback, I thought they might help you a little, but you'll go back again just as bad as before."

However, the testimonial given below will clearly show the pigheaded dogmatist through all the transparent venom of his character. And just as that man acted so are nine-tenths of the physicians of Brooklyn acting to-day.

The fact is, they themselvs know very well that their system is rotten at the base, and can only be supported by conduct such as this villain evinced. He would rather hav seen his patient suffer and die than to hav seen the "WILSONIA" Garments cure the man.

Another case I would note, that of Professor Hatch Smith, whose testimony is given below.

That poor man for three weary weeks applied to one of his physicians, begging him to make inquiry into the nature of the "WILSONIA" Garments, telling him, with all the confidence with which a child treats a parent, that he would not test them without his consent. Yet this dogmatic physician, to whom many of the Brooklyn people look up with reverence, evinced his selfishness and spleen by absolutely refusing to inquire into the matter. Yet Professor Smith to-day will tell you that he is as strong physically as at any time in his life, and many of his friends say he was never known to be so strong as now. Am I not therefore justified in saying, "LISTEN TO YOUR PHYSICIANS AND DIE, OR WEAR THE 'WILSONIA' MAGNETIC GARMENTS AND LIV HEALTHFUL LIVES?"

These men would rather see their patients die under their hands than that they should wear the "WILSONIA" Garments.

Again, another note as to these men's treatment of their confiding patients.

Two ladies called upon me last week, and one, in my consulting-rooms, with tears in her eyes, told me the following story:

"Mr. Wilson," said she, "nothing you can say against the system of medicin as practiced in Brooklyn can possibly be overdrawn. Last week," said this lady, "I had a lovely niece taken temporarily ill, having been in tolerably good health previously. One of our fashionable doctors, who prides himself upon his gay equipages, was called in as physician in the case. My niece being somewhat restless two or three nights in succession, this fellow prescribed what he called a soothing draft, but so soothing did it prove itself that the child never awoke from the sleep it produced, and my niece to-day lies in Greenwood Cemetery, another victim of the malpractice of our physicians in the city of Brooklyn."

And yet this man to-day drives through Fulton street regularly on his daily mission of sending his victims to the tomb. Unaccountable fact! And yet you people of Brooklyn and New York, in face of such alarming evidences as these, hav no more penetration than to confer with such charlatans as to the virtue of any new discoveries of which these dogmatists hav not the slightest knowledge.

The "WILSONIA" magnetic garments are as harmless upon the body as would be a sheet of paper, and yet withal so potent that persons, no matter how diseased, MUST BECOME PERFECTLY HEALTHY IN TWELVE MONTHS FROM THEIR FIRST WEARING THEM.

Can such evidence be filed as to the innocence of drugging? Even where the patients are not always killed, the seeds of disease are daily sown by the kid-gloved hands of our charlatan physicians. Nine-tenths of the practicing physicians of Brooklyn should be cast in the category of criminals; and as long as I liv and hav liberty of speech I shall cry down the iniquitous practices and the drugging systems of our colleges. I will never pander to what I know to be a lie, nor will I rest until I hav compelled the legislatures of this country to stay their hands in the chartering of colleges, wherein legalized murderers may be trained, then to be thrown broadcast upon society, either to become idlers or murderers.

The facts stated above and the testimonies given below are sufficient evidence to any thinking man or woman that such are the results of the present legislativ measures in reference to the practice of medicin.

Therefore Take Medicin and Die, or Wear the "Wilsonia" Garments and Liv.

LIVING WITNESSES.

The following words of commendation and appeal from the pens of living witnesses to the marvelous virtue of the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS will be found of general and special interest, covering, as they do, a great variety of the most complicated forms of disease, some, or all of them, beyond the reach of materia medica, as acknowledged by the foremost among our physicians, to whom some of our legislatures hav conferred exclusiv privileges for drugging, curing, or killing:

MIRACULOUS CURE OF PARALYSIS AND HERNIA.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 11, 1881.

Some time during the month of September, 1880, I was induced, through the representations of Mr. Wilson, inventor and proprietor of the "WILSONIA," to apply the goods to my father, 63 years of age, who was suffering from paralysis of the lower extremities—since January, 1880—having received at that time two strokes of paralysis which rendered him helpless, so far as motiv power was concerned. While on a visit to my father at Schenectady, New York, I induced him to return to Brooklyn with me, against the protests of friends and his physician, who said I would never reach Brooklyn with him alive. Suffice it to say that with the assistance of my mother we succeeded, after a very trying ordeal in reaching my residence—which to gain necessitated the use of carriages, steamboats, and cars. During the journey my father said he was positiv he could not reach Brooklyn alive—which to me was a double source of anxiety.

The second day after our arrival my father was clothed in the "WILSONIA." Gradually he began to gain strength in his limbs, and on the evening of the third day he walked to and fro through my hall and sitting-room without any assistance whatever. He continued to gain, and on the ninth day returned home, using only cars and boats to get there. After being away from here about two weeks he wrote me that he was walking every day as usual and on different occasions had walked from three to four miles in a day, just to test his ability. He had also suffered from hernia for the past twenty years, and just prior to his coming to this city he was placed under the influence of chloroform, with five respected, intelligent physicians standing over him to perform an operation, which, after careful consideration, they deemed unadvisable. Since he has been wearing the "WILSONIA" I hav heard no references made to this trouble. T. DeT. TRUAX,
376 Dean street.

REMARKABLE CURE OF CATARRH.

Nota Bene.—Being persuaded and constrained by the miraculous help received by my father, I put on a set of the "WILSONIA" goods, and it has completely cured me of catarrh, as well as kept me from taking cold, to which I was very susceptible. Now my entire family is clothed in the "WILSONIA." I would not be without the magnetic garments, whatever their cost. T. DeT. TRUAX.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

CASE OF PROF. HATCH SMITH.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

POSITIV CURE OF SCIATICA.

No. 111 HUDSON ST., JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: After wearing your Magnetic Garments four weeks I am so satisfied and astonished at the results that I most cheerfully advise my friends that I hav found all that your agent claimed for your goods to be true. I was afflicted with sciatica of the bone of the knee—was injured by a fall—which was so painful I was unable to get any sleep. The pain was entirely removed the first night the goods were applied. The sciatica is getting out, and I now fully believe I shall be entirely well.
JOHN SMITH.

MARVELOUS CURE OF HEART DISEASE.

BROOKLYN, March 10.

This is to certify that I hav been suffering for the past nine years with heart disease; hav been attended by various physicians and given up to die, each one pronouncing my case hopeless. The last one said I could not liv but a short time. I hav taken various kinds of medicins, but the doctors and the medicins did me no good. Nothing would reach my case nor allay my suffering from pain, the rapid beating and the suffocating feeling of my heart, until on the 26th of December, 1880, an agent from the Brooklyn Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor gave me an order to procure a set of goods called the "WILSONIA." My sister called for the goods, I being unable to go out, and on the 28th of December I received and put on the goods. I experienced a change for the better within twenty-four hours. I hav not taken one drop of medicin since, and hav gained strength and flesh; hav no more pain, and hav an excellent appetite, which, before, was very poor. I can also lie down and sleep all night without any suffocating feeling or pain. My bowels are now regular, but before wearing the "WILSONIA" I was compelled to take large doses of castor oil, administered to me by my sister every other day. To all who are suffering from like cause, I urge, if you wish to gain health, wear the "WILSONIA." Respectfully yours, MARY MANNING,
31 Vine street.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.

181 COLUMBIA ST., BROOKLYN, March 15.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hav been a sufferer from varicose veins for some thirty years. Late last fall I was suffering very severely with a sore on one of my legs, and I had come to the conclusion, as I could get no relief from the remedies prescribed by our best physicians, that I would hav to go to bed a helpless invalid. Fortunately, however, about the first of December, I learned that an acquaintance of mine on the river, having the same trouble, put on a suit of your "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS a few weeks before, and was then, to his great delight and astonishment, rapidly recovering. Thereupon I visited you and clothed myself in a suit of the same goods. That was indeed a wise act on my part, for I soon found my distended veins were decreasing, the pains lessening, and the sore on my leg in a short time was healed. Not only these wonderful and pleasing results, but my general health I found was improving all the time, and instead of going to my bed a helpless invalid I kept upon my feet every day and attended to my business, as I hav done from that period to the present time, with scarcely any discomfort. Before putting on the "WILSONIA" I had many sleepless nights from pains in my head and trouble in the respiratory organs, but since wearing them I sleep as well nearly as at any previous time of my life. I consider the "WILSONIA" appliances an invention of the highest value to mankind, and deem it nothing more than my duty to commend them whenever I hav an opportunity. I would especially commend them to all afflicted with varicose veins. From observations I hav made in other cases I am led to think there is hardly any disease in which the WILSONIA GARMENTS could not be applied with great benefit.
Respectfully yours, DAVID COLLIER.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowing what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

A MOTHER'S TESTIMONY.

My baby was teething, and had a severe bowel trouble she was restless and cried nights almost constantly. Mrs Wilson put upon her a "WILSONIA" suit, and within two hours my baby was entirely at rest; went to sleep, slept soundly, and has been well ever since, growing stronger every day. She had been very susceptible to colds, but since wearing the "WILSONIA" garments has been entirely free from them. I could do mothers no greater service than to induce them to make the "WILSONIA" a part of their baby's swaddling-clothes.
MRS. GEORGE W. DAWSON,
March 1. 484 Adelphi street, Brooklyn.

Let it be borne in mind constantly, that the "WILSONIA" appliances, adapted to all sizes of persons, will not only cure babies of all their ailments, but are equally successfully worn by persons of any and every age suffering from any disease known to man, less an organ actually decayed.

THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

MOST ASTOUNDING REVELATIONS AS TO ITS VALUE.

IN SPITE OF THE PREJUDICE AND DOGMATIC BIGOTRY OF THE PAMPERED FACULTY OF BROOKLYN.

Several of these malicious physicians having been thoroughly beaten in argument and in fact are now wickedly attempting to coerce several tradesmen whose names hav appeared as references in my circular, to cause them to withdraw their names from my list and to recant their statements previously made in favor of my discovery. Most notably three tradesmen in Brooklyn hav been placed in this position. One man who had sent me at least one hundred patients, and had stated to them that he would not take $5,000 for his belt purchased of me, has had the effrontery, for the sake of dollars and cents, to make calumnious statements against myself and invention, although there are one hundred persons ready to testify that this man had publicly stated that my goods had absolutely cured him of a disease of twenty years' standing. And as further evidence of the value of my goods this same man procured a second quantity after six months' trial of the first lot.

Truly may it be said, "Men in the present day will, like Esau of old, sell even their birthrights and their freedom of manhood for a mess of pottage."

But let the physicians of Brooklyn continue this conduct as they may, their downfall is certain, even though they purchase the freedom of thought of every man in Brooklyn.

READ

The marvelous testimonies given above, and then having used your common sense, say whether or not these purchased calumnies should not be outweighed by the printed testimony of such men as David Collier, of Columbia street, Brooklyn; of Prof. Hatch Smith, of Dean street; of T. De Truax, of Dean street; of Joel Cannon, of Jay street; of Mrs. Hall, of Clinton avenue; of Mary Manning, of Vine street; of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, of Livingston street; of Mr. Haley, of Fulton Market; of J. B. Hoyt & Co., of Spruce street, New York; of Mr. Stimpson, of Spruce street; of Hugh Byron Brown, of Science Hall, Eighth street, and hundreds of other respectable and well-known ladies and gentlemen of Brooklyn and New York who can testify to the value of my magnetic clothing who had utterly failed to receive any benefit or any relief from the many physicians to whom they had applied.

Upon mature reflection it will be clear to every reasonable mind that although a few men, such as those quoted above, may sell their consciences for dollars and cents, we can rest assured men who will, for said dollars and cents, strip themselvs of their manhood will at least find themselvs thoroughly exposed and their calumnies laid bare.

My challenge to the physicians of the hospitals of Brooklyn (with the offer of $5,000 worth of my goods, and $5,000 cash to be given to the institution if I fail to cure nine-tenths of their so-called incurables) is still open, and will be open to them for twelve months.

THEREFORE TAKE MEDICIN AND DIE, OR WEAR THE "WILSONIA" GARMENTS AND LIV.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF BROOKLYN.

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF ARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

N. B.—The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING will cure the worst form of rheumatism known to man. Eight cases out of every twelve can be cured in from four to six months, and the worst possible cases in twelve months, when the goods are worn as I direct. My difficulty is, many persons will get rotten with disease, spend thousands of dollars in poisonous drugs, until they become walking pest houses, and then expect to jump into new life in two or three months. This is an impossibility. But the "WILSONIA" will cure in every case, no matter of how long standing. But our common sense must be used in every instance.

Listen to the physicians of Brooklyn, take medicin, an die, or wear the "WILSONIA" Garments and liv.

Gems of Thought.

I HAV a sacred pride in my peasant father, and would not exchange him, even now, for any king known to me. Gold and the genuin stamp—the 'an and the clothes of the man. Let me thank 'for that greatest of blessings and strive to liv 'ily of it.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

THE Jesuits hav obtained a papal decree [1634] condemning Galileo's doctrin about the motion of the earth. It is all in vain. If the world is really turning round, all mankind together will not be able to keep it from turning, or to keep themselvs from turning with it.—Pascal's Letters.

NO one is bound by natural law to liv according to the pleasure of another, but every one is, by natural title, the rightful asserter of his own independence. He or they govern best who concede to every man the privilege of thinking as he pleases and of saying what he thinks.—Spinoza.

THOU, proud man, look upon yon starry vault.
Survey the countless gems that thickly stud
The night's imperial chariot. . .
Now, proud man, now where is thy greatness fled?
What art thou in the scale of the universe?
Less, less than nothing! —H. Kirke White.

DR. PALEY used to consider the Thirty-nine Articles of religion as mere articles of peace of which it was impossible that the framers could expect any one person to believe the whole, as they contain altogether about two hundred and forty distinct and many of them inconsistent propositions. —Life of Paley.

SWEET are the uses of adversity,
Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head;
And this our life, exempt from public haunt,
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running
brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in everything.
—Shakspere.

Is there for honest poverty
That hings its head and a' that?
The coward slave, we pass him by,
We dare be poor for a' that.
For a' that and a' that;
Our toils obscure and a' that.
The rank is but the guinea-stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that.
—Burns.

THE world has been progressing all along through the ages; but all of good, all of truth, or all of wisdom is confined to no one god, man, or race, people, or age. And it is a very great and monstrous mistake to say the Bible has emancipated woman. Why, I could fill volumes with the wrongs, indignities, and cruelties that hav been perpetrated upon women in the name of the Bible.—Elmina D. Slenker.

WE see in needleworks and embroideries it is more pleasing to hav a lively work upon a sad and solemn ground than to hav a dark and melancholy work upon a lightsome ground; judge, therefore, of the pleasure of the heart by the pleasure of the eye. Certainly virtue is like precious odors, most frequent where they are incensed or crushed; for prosperity doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue.—Bacon's Essays.

IT is melancholy to see how helplessly Addison gropes his way from blunder to blunder in his famous "Essay on the Evidences of Christianity." He assigns, as grounds for his religious belief, stories as absurd as that of the Cock-law ghost, and forgeries as rank as Ireland's Vortigern, puts faith in the lie about the Thundering Legion, is convinced that Tiberius moved the Senate to admit Jesus among the gods, and pronounces the Letter of Agbarus, king of Edessa, to be a record of great authority. Nor were these errors the effects of superstition, for to superstition Addison was by no means prone. The truth is that he was writing about what he did not understand.—Macaulay.

THE disciplin of slavery is unknown
Amongst us; hence the more do we require
The disciplin of virtue; order else
Cannot subsist, nor confidence, nor peace.
Thus, duties rising out of good possessed,
And prudent caution needful to avert
Impending evil, equally require
That the whole people should be taught and trained.
So shall licentiousness and black resolve
Be rooted out, and virtuous habits
Take their place; and genuin piety descend,
Like an inheritance, from age to age.
—Wordsworth.

THE grand project of all for defeating and extirpating heresy was brought to maturity in Spain. But as it sometimes happens that the physician is able to cure the disease, but that when the disease is thoroughly conquered the patient dies, so it happened in Spain that no sooner was heresy extirpated than the state declined and perished. In fact the Spanish Inquisition, by making every exertion of the mind dangerous, all theological learning penal, and all social intercourse beset with unseen pitfalls, extinguished the minds of the nation, destroyed liberty in its Parliament, valor in its armies, wisdom in its statesmen, and made one of the proudest and bravest nations in the world a byword of imbecility, ignorance, and apathy.—Earl Russell.

EDUCATION promotes peace by teaching men the realities of life and the obligations which are involved in the very existence of society; it promotes intellectual development, not only by training the individual intellect, but by sifting out from the masses of ordinary or inferior capacities those who are competent to increase the general welfare by occupying higher positions; and, lastly, it promotes morality and refinement by teaching men to disciplin themselvs and by leading them to see that the highest, as it is the only permanent, content is to be attained, not by groveling in the rank and steaming valleys of sense, but by continual striving toward those high peaks, where, resting in eternal calm, reason discovers the undefined but bright ideal of the highest Good—"a cloud by day, a pillar of fire by night."—Huxley.

Odds and Ends.

AN Irish editor says: "Our women are accused of being fond of whistling. Well, so be it. What is more lovely than tulips well blown?"

LOOK not upon the cucumber when it shineth green in the basket, for at last it grippeth like a pair of nippers, and twisteth like a thumb-screw.

PEOPLE speak carelessly of "bloated aristocrats," as if an aristocrat is always obese. This is wrong. Some of the aristocracy of to-day is mighty thin.

WHEN yesterday I asked you, love,
One little word to say,
Your brother interrupted us,
So please say yes-ter-day.

POLICEMAN.—"Now, then, move on! There's nothing the matter here." Sarcastic boy: "Of course there isn't. If there was, you wouldn't be here."

NOW doth the rural matron
Prepare her garden patch;
Erstwhile the hen approacheth,
To scratch, and scratch, and scratch.

NOTICE at the door of a ready-made clothing establishment in one of the poorer quarters of Paris: "Do not go somewhere else to be robbed; walk in here."

"PAPA, I saw a young sparrow fall out of its nest this morning." "Well, what of it, my son?" "Why, I don't think the Lord could hav noticed its fall, papa, because the cat got it."

A YOUNG gentleman the other day asked a young lady what she thought of the married state in general. "Not knowing, I can't tell," was the reply, "but if you and I were to put our heads together, I could giv you a definit answer."

A GENTLEMAN who always meant to pay his debts, but could not make up his mind to do so, drove a pair of splendid bays. "Ah! my friend," said he, "how do you do? How do you like my hosses? Very costly. What do you think I gave for the pair?" The false, inhuman friend, or rather fiend, simply grunted, "I guess you gave your note."

A MISSING RAILROAD.—When Cheyenne was in the zenith of its glory, a sign of "General Offices of the Cheyenne, Pacific Slope, and Sandwich Islands Railroad" was hung out without creating the least surprise. If one person asked another where the depot of said road was, there might hav been some hesitation about answering it, but it was some time after the sign was out before any special inquiries began to be made. Then an Eastern man walked in one day, carpet-bag in hand, and said:

"I suppose you connect at San Francisco with the regular steamers?"

"Well, yes; I suppose we shall," was the hesitating reply.

"Shall? Isn't your road through yet?"

"Well, not quite."

"Do you take in Salt Lake?

"Salt Lake? Yes, I think we do."

"How much for a ticket?"

"Well, I can't say exactly, as we havn't any on sale yet."

"Can I get one at the depot?"

"Well, I think not; we havn't any depot yet."

"Can I pay on the train?"

"Well, you see, we hav no trains yet."

"I suppose I can walk on the track?" persisted the stranger.

"Well, I should hav no objection if we had a track."

"No depot, no tickets, no trains, no track! What sort of a railroad hav you got, anyway?"

"Well, you see it's only on paper thus far, but as soon as we sell eight million dollars' worth of stock we shall begin grading and rush business right along. If you happen to be going along when we get to going, we will put you through as low as any other responsible route."

The stranger stuck his hands in his pockets, stared hard, whistled softly, and then walked out on tip-toe without another word.

SHE SHOOED IT AWAY.—They were a party of four couples coming over on the steamboat Sausalito last Sunday, and the prettiest girl of the gushers looked up to Mount Tamalapais and said:

"Oh, that horrid mountain! I had the most frightful adventure up there last summer you ever heard of. It's a wonder my hair didn't turn white."

"What on earth was it?" chorussed the rest.

"Well, you see, I was up there with a private picnic party, and I wandered off by myself about a mile, picking flowers. After a while I sat down to rest in a lonely canyon, and before long I heard a queer rustling sound in some bushes right behind me. I knew at once, somehow, that it was a grizzly."

"Great Scott! and you all alone!" shuddered her escort.

"Not a soul within a mile of me. I was just paralyzed with terror. I didn't dare to stir, but in a minute I heard the beast coming toward me through the thicket."

"Oh, if I had only been there," said the young man, breathing very hard.

"I knew it was no use to try and run, and I had heard somewhere that bears never touch dead people. So I just shut my eyes and held my breath."

"Gracious!"

"Pretty soon that great brute walked up close and began sniffing me all over. Oh, it was just terrible!"

"Should hav thought you would hav fainted."

"Oh, I didn't dare to," said the heroin.

"Just then, I suppose, the party rushed up and rescued you," said the appalled audience.

"No, they didn't. Pretty soon I felt the great beast pulling at the flowers in my hat, so I just got up and shooed the horrid thing away."

"What, the grizzly?"

"Oh, it wasn't a grizzly. It was a nasty old cow. But just suppose it had been a grizzly!"

But the audience refused to "suppose," and the party looked like a Quaker funeral until the boat struck the wharf.

JAPAN is now supporting six large universities on the European plan.

THE audience which gathered in Rochester to hear Talmage lecture was so small that he refused to appear.

ACCORDING to Secretary Blaine, there are more than 1,000,000 applications for office on file in the various departments at Washington.

THERE are many prehistoric ruins in Arizona. A writer in the Tucson Citizen says that six miles north of Camp Lowell, at the base of the Santa Catalina Mountains, there are the remains of an ancient town, covering an area of over sixty acres.

IT is said that the wife of an English officer has written to tell him that, having embraced Buddhism, she, in right of her new faith, divorces him. It is inferred that her change of faith will be extensivly followed if it be found to carry with it such privileges.

SAD it is to learn that the Rev. Sidney M. Stray, of Warrensburg, Ohio, had to be suspended by the Troy Presbytery. He went a-Stray. LATER: The Rev. Mr. Stray ran away and committed suicide by drowning himself in the Missouri river. Let us hope he has gone to Jesus.

MEXICO is becoming the favorit field for missionary enterprise. The Methodist church South appropriates $82,500 this year, and other denominations are showing increased energy in that direction. Mexico will, at this rate, soon outrank China and Africa in missionary estimation.

A STRIKING illustration of the depreciation in the value of landed property is afforded by a remark made recently by one of the richest noblemen in England, who, in conversation on the subject, said he should be glad to get a return of 1 per cent on the estimated value of his land.

BISMARCK is becoming thoroughly distressed over the German exodus to America. The cause of it is the immense standing army which Germany supports; and as the remedy is disbandment, it will not be applied in Bismarck's time. In consequence the emigration will continue.

THE steeple of the Congregational church in Northfield, Minn., was 135 feet high. A sudden storm knocked it to splinters and scattered its remains around the neighborhood. The church was not quite finished, but its wreck is almost total. Thus the mysterious workings of divine providence are manifested.

Punch records the following conversation: "How uncommonly well the Tories hav treated Bradlaugh!" "What! treated him well! Why, they don't allow him to enter the House." "Exactly. They spare him all the boredoms of debates, but let him go into the smoking and dining rooms, where all the fun is."

THE Rev. Dr. Henry W. Bellows, pastor of All Souls church, at Fourth avenue and Twentieth street, said Sunday morning, in a sermon on the revised New Testament, that the revision was, in his opinion, an unnecessary work. It might not result in positiv injury, but it could hardly effect much good. The King James version was good.

THE new firm of Moody & Miller has gone into the revival business. The senior partner is Dwight L. Moody, the famous evangelist, formerly with Ira D. Sankey, and the junior is E. F. Miller, formerly a workman in the car shops at Denver. Moody and Sankey are said to hav disagreed as to the division of the proceeds from the sale of Sankey's hymn books, and Miller is to take the place of Sankey in the new concern.

IN his recent speech in Philadelphia, Mr. Franklin B. Gowen repeats what he said long ago before a committee of Congress, namely, that the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is the property of the Pennsylvania Railroad. He might also hav said, but he did not, that so long as the judges allow themselvs to be transported on free passes, which the law allows only to employees of the company, they cannot complain if they are placed in that category.

SOME of the pyramids of Sakkara, near Cairo, Egypt, hav been opened by the expert Maspero. The ones explored are those containing the tombs of the Egyptian kings of the fifth dynasty. On the mortuary chapels of these are inscriptions of small and closely-written texts, which, properly interpreted, giv details of the religious beliefs and customs which prevailed at the time the inscriptions were made, and which show that previous belief on these matters is utterly at fault. This discovery is regarded as of great value to archæologists, historians, and scientists.

SAYS Col. Ingersoll, speaking of the Pueblos: "I saw but few of the nativs. I met a great number of real big-hearted, generous Americans. I am told, though, that the Pueblos are most excellent, industrious, honest, ignorant, and harmless people—that they are as patient as the little donkeys that they maul. The Pueblos are all Catholics, and hav been turned over by the Interior Department to the Presbyterians. It seems to me almost cruel to take advantage of a poor Indian in that way. It is bad enough to be a savage, but to be a savage and a Presbyterian is too much. The Pueblos are now a good sort of folks, but after the Presbyterians hav had them in charge for a few years they had better be watched."

THE scheme for connecting Great Britain with the Continent by a tunnel under the English Channel has received a fresh impulse from the publication of the report for 1880 of the business of the Suez Canal. The canal earned last year over $8,000,000 gross, and $7,000,000 net, and it being estimated that the channel tunnel can be constructed for $50,000,000, returns equally lucrativ in comparison are expected from it. At all events, the four hundred founders' shares of $1,000 each, which carry the privilege of subscribing to the capital should the enterprise be seriously undertaken, are now selling for $20,000 each. The original $1,000 founders' shares of the Suez Canal are now represented by stock worth $133,000 each.

THOSE who sit up to see the comet in the small hours of the morning will be rewarded for their pains by another celestial spectacle hardly less interesting than the comet itself. Venus, Jupiter, Saturn, and Mars are now grouped close together in the morning sky, and they present a splendid appearance. Venus is not far past her period of greatest brilliancy, and she outshines all the others, the vapors of the horizon making her scintillate in a manner that, though provoking enough in the telescope, adds to her beauty as seen by the unassisted eye. Jupiter is very bright; Saturn's rings are still opening wider, and Mars is growing larger as he nears the earth, and in a short time will be in a position to afford possessors of powerful telescopes a good view of his continents and oceans.

HOW THE GODLY WORK IT.—A woman appeared at a Rock Island hotel, engaged a room, and asked to hav her brother sent up when he arrived. A sleek young man soon came, inquired if his sister was there, and was shown to her apartment. A bottle of whisky was ordered, and the next thing heard from the pair was the noise of boisterous revelry. The landlord interrupted the diversion, and threatened to turn the disturbers out. The young man, who was very drunk, sobbed out in a maudlin way, "For God's sake, don't do that; I'm a Methodist preacher. I am, really; my name is Meredith." He told the truth, for he was the Rev. Geo. Francis Meredith, a remarkably popular pastor of a church at Kansas City, and the woman was a deacon's wife.

A CANADA man who livs in Ottawa has been imitating the example of Noah. It has been revealed to him that there will be a great flood. He has been building an ark in which he and his family may safely stem the current of the rising waters. The neighbors laugh at the precautions taken by this man, but he says he can stand it, for he has no doubt that Noah was laughed at by the people who saw him building his ark. The ark-builder's wife has been busy for some days cooking provisions for his expected voyage, and it is understood that the family will be ready to embark at a moment's notice when the waters rise sufficiently to float the vessel. Probably this modern Noah will hav a fine time in getting pairs and sevens of all species of animal life in his boat.

THE Rev. James E. Hall was deposed from the Congregational ministry at Roxbury, Mass., on account of injudicious attentions to the women of his congregation. He claimed that his punishment was utterly undeserved, and he went to St. Louis for the purpose, he said, of demonstrating his piety by a life free from the shadow of reproach. He joined a Presbyterian church in that city, and took a foremost part in its affairs, preparatory to an early return to the pulpit. But he has had a second and dreadful set back. Sisters Burge, Sayres, Stone, Adams, and Wallace, of the same congregation, all say that he has engaged himself to marry them, while he has really married Miss Hardwicke, notwithstanding the existence of a legal wife in Massachusetts. His affairs are further complicated by the exposure of a plan to elope with a pretty inmate of a girls' reformatory institution.

WHAT will the American Bible Society do with the revised New Testament? The Rev. Dr. Taylor, formerly secretary of the society, says in the Independent that it will "wisely and necessarily refuse to be forced into any measure for the premature adoption and publication of a revision which has yet to endure the double test of critical scholarship and of popular approval." He thinks that the present demand for the volume is being fully supplied by private publishers. "Nor will Bible societies," he adds, "find their vocation gone by continuing to print and circulate the common version. The most that they can do will be to publish the New concurrently with the Old, and this they will do only when they find the demand sufficiently urgent to justify the change of constitutions and charters, and the necessary risks and expenses of the work; but until there shall be more unanimity in its favor, on both sides of the ocean, they will make haste slowly."

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XI.

Here the abbé was silent again. While we meditated upon the last words of Alamontada he turned the leaves in the book. He finally found the sought-for passage, and said, "Hear, my dear friends, yet the last for to-day, and once for me, and perhaps, for you now, the most important of all that that venerable slave spoke."

"Ah!" cried the tender Roderick with emotion, "is that possible? A slave!—a galley-slave! How could so much wisdom be found in him, or rather, how could a man of such insight, of such lofty principles, err so deeply that he was forged to the bench of the greatest criminals for life? It is incomprehensible!"

"To-morrow you shall learn this also," said Dillon, "how a strange chain of circumstances could so deeply ruin the good Alamontada. Behold, beloved ones, I honor his memory, like the memory of a saint. He has written a diary of his unfortunate life; out of this I afterward put his biography together, as well as from what he verbally has related to me about it. He left me this diary and his little writings, written mostly on the ship or on the hot shores of Africa, as a bequest. But I was not yet satisfied with that. I wanted to become the possessor of his chain. I received it. A skilled master also painted his picture for me."

"His picture!", exclaimed Roderick, "and that you hav never yet shown us. Truly, he is one of the most noble among men. I conjure you, dear abbé, show me his portrait!"

Dillon arose. We took the candles and followed our friend through several rooms into the library, which was, at the same time, his study-room. He stepped before a glass case and opened the door.

There hung Alamontada's picture, and around it a heavy iron chain.

"This chain," said Dillon, "serves my saint instead of a wreath of glory."

"Is it possible?" cried Roderick, with moist eye and gently quivering voice; "is it then possible that a man like this had to bear that unfortunate fetter? What nobility, what admirable tranquillity of disposition, in these features!"

Roderick was right. Here was not the hidden gloominess, withdrawing into one's self, the rough, the audacious, which commonly marks the faces of low, mean criminals. It was the countenance of a sufferer, full of unspeakable highness and power. Out of the sickly, pale features; out of the languid lines around the closed lips; out of the slight inclination of the head toward the shoulder; out of the forehead full of wrinkles, around which waved thin hair, turned gray altogether too early by heavy grief, one recognized the nameless deep sorrow, and the thousand manifold sufferings, which must, in a terrible row of years, gradually kill this noble man. But the firm and yet so kind-hearted look of the eyes revealed again a character wherein calmness dwelt, while storms raged without; a spirit mighty through joyful consciousness, that could smile at the pains of its inclosure, and forgiv the vultures of Prometheus while they tore at his heart.

We stood long before the attractiv painting: It seemed to us as if the sufferer's spirit floated over us. Melancholy took possession of our hearts. Dillon laid his hand upon the chain, and, looking upward, sighed:

"It was an earthly angel! He was innocent and bore undeserved suffering. Ah! and how he bore it! Alamontada, one day I will die, like thee—would I might do so with the high sense of virtue, like thyself!"

After a while Dillon led us back into the former room.

"It grows late, beloved," said he. "To-morrow we shall enjoy the history of the remarkable man. But yet, I promised to impart to you out of our conversations, one of Alamontada's most important thoughts. Colleet once more your attention. It is the loftiest thought that mortal, after the thought, "God" can think. As often as it enters my soul, my soul feels its highness, its innate dignity. It feels everything earthly leave it, and learns, disconnected with all parts of the universe, in solitude, belonging only to itself, to recognize its high independence, and to imagin its destiny dawning in far distances."

We seated ourselvs again, as before. Then the abbé took the papers and read.

CHAPTER XII.

"The longer I conversed with Alamontada the more venerable he appeared to me. He had become my teacher, I, his pupil. I, sent by Captain Delaubin to lead him back to religion—he had become my converter. I felt my reason satisfied again within itself, and my doubts reconciled with one another. I was convinced that I, heretofore, had not been thinking, but dreaming; that I endeavored to picture in my fancy objects which are without connection with experience and the sensual world, objects which only want to be touched by the glances of reason; that all my unbelief originated only therein; that I would philosophize with my power of imagination, and, from the nature of the divinity or from the nature and possibility of eternal being, would create, as it were, a picture-like representation, as one is accustomed to hav them of sensual things. I was convinced that the child who imagins to itself God as a mighty, aged man; the savage, who thinks him to be a destructiv fire—that all, with child-like daringness, deceived themselvs.

"'But, dear Alamontada,' said I, 'man is in spite of all, a very sensual being, and his power of imagination cannot rest. It demands to represent to itself the supreme being in some manner. Thou must confess thyself that thou art not always capable to keep thy mind upon the same hight of strained meditation; that it relieves thee, then, to think of God, when thy spirit has relaxed under the pressure of thy mortal body and circumstances.'

"'Certainly,' replied Alamontada. 'Not always am I inclined and able to think the godhead in clear ideas. It is pleasing to me, as a man, to draw God, as it were, nearer to me and to make him better acquainted with the rest of my perceptions. In such hours he appears to me as a sacred, all-loving being, who has called myself and all else into existence to enjoy blissfulness. His wisdom, of which millions of testimonials occupy me, and his holiness, awaken in me a childlike, unlimited confidence in him, as my father. It pleases me to giv myself up to him. It does me good to cry out my grief before him. It satisfies me to complain to him what my human brethren do not want to hear. I am then not entirely forsaken, and there is one who takes pity upon me.

"'Behold, dear sir, this belief in God, the necessity, the unavoidableness, of my eternal existence, no matter how and where—this is my religion. And this religion hav all nations, all human beings who to some degree enjoy the development of their reason.

"'And Jesus Christ has rendered therein a great service to humanity, that he has represented to them God under the picture of the father, as the holiest, most perfect, as the all-blissful and all-blessing being, but which can be comprehended by no earthly sense.

"'But his teaching took, as it came to the different different colors and additions, according as a nation had already been more or less cultivated, or according to the difference of their religious preconceptions, which it had before the appearance of Christianity, and afterward melted together, willingly or unwillingly, with this.

"'There is an endless difference of degrees from low, coarse sensuality up to the trained power of reason. This variety causes the variety (not of religion, for there is only one religion in the universe), the additions to religion, which are often taken for one and the same, and on that account man believes in a plurality of religions. Therefore arose and will arise the different religious parties, in these parties again the sects, and in the sects again the peculiar religious perceptions of each individual. How can it be otherwise? Every educated person changes his religion more than once during life, as his knowledge, his moral wants, and his temperament change. Another faith has the child; another, when it ripens into youth; another, as a young man; another, as a man rich in experience and forethought; another, when he seizes the supporting staff of old age.

"'And leave to them still this variety, which you cannot root out. Every one has a belief answering to his wants; changes the want, then thrives the busy mind further up, and the buds unfold themselvs to blossoms, and he is enveloped by a new belief. You cannot become a world-reformer with the sword. Opinions and ideas cannot be trimmed with the iron shears of power. Every religion becomes purer and nobler through cutting loose from the coarser and then from the finer sensuality, and strengthening of reason. Leave to the Roman Catholic his grand pomp in temples and altars, and to the Mennonite his rustic simplicity, and to the thinker the quiet meditation within the walls of his study-room. Only clear away everywhere obstacles which oppose the education of the mind; make him freer, more fit to think, and you hav done all that you are obliged to do.

"'Every man has his religion, except he only, who, with all talents, has not courage enough to consider himself, but floats in confused doubts, and, in order to rid himself of their uncomfortableness, seeks to extinguish their memory in sensual dissipation, and with one proposition, accepted indiscriminately and without further examination. These unfortunate beings, whose teacher of morals and right is only convenience, knot in themselvs the outer ends of human education together; brutality of their animal nature, with keen-sensedness, wit, and power of discrimination.

If the voice of unconquerable nature (the law of reason) did not, against their expectations and against their will, sometimes speak in their breast, and thus compel them to acknowledge there is right, and, say what one will, virtue is amiable; and did not this gigantic power pull them along against their will, truly, sir, these human beings would be the most dangerous beasts on the globe. The frightful inclinations, the passions of the wild animal are in them, terribly coupled with the prudence of the human mind.'

"'Dear Alamontada,' said I, moved by the power and highness with which he spoke to me, 'then thou also believest that the wisest among mortals must hav religion, not only because he will and shall not be a being in opposition with himself, but, also, because he needs a religion in order to be virtuous. I confess, to my astonishment, about that thou hast hitherto been entirely silent. For one comprehends in that which thou callest religion what others call natural religion, or religion of reason, not only a belief in a God and the immortality of the spirit, but, also, of the holy order of the universe, that is, the belief that, here or there, sooner or later, recompense takes place, a punishment of vice, a reward of noble souls. To that, my dear, I would hav liked long ago to hav called thy attention, if fear to interrupt the course of thy thoughts had not kept me back."

SOME OBSERVATIONS UPON THAT HORRIBLE AND CRUEL ORDINANCE IN DEVIL-WORSHIP, NAMELY, BLOODY SACRIFICES AND BURNT-OFFERINGS. BY THE VERY REV. EVAN DAVIES (MYFGR MORGANWG) D. D., L.L.D., ARCH DRUID OF GREAT BRITAIN.

TRANSLATED BY MORION B. C.

To further prove that black Saturn, the seventh zodiacal symbol, is mixed up in the Hebrew deity, they name their seventh day after him, and keep it holy, as his day on which he rested. The cessation of the work of Hü in September, when growth ceases and decay commences, first gave the idea of a Sabbath day. One of the astronomical titles of Saturn is Schebetai, and his angel was Sabbathai El. The God of Israel was also the god of the circumcision, an idea borrowed from the supposed emasculation of Hü when he lost his generativ force in autumn, and became Said Wrn; hence arose also the idea of making eunuchs. Also we find that the Hebrews had in their country lingas (pillars in the Bible), which had stood in Palestine since some long past age. Hence they boasted that their ancestors Jacob, Joshua, and others had reared these Celtic symbols and instituted the arks of stone. In Deut. xxxii, 18 (Of the rock [stone, linga] that begat thee thou art unmindful and hast forgotten God that formed thee), we find the linga of Saturn referred to as the linga of Our Father. Further, it is easy to prove that it was the tabernacle and ark of Saturn that they claim to hav borne through the wilderness. And in the Sanskrit Sinai it appears to be the mount of Saturn which they called the mount of God. Shadai originally is identical with Seithyn and Satan (seventh symbol or autumnal equinox), but is mixed up with other higher attributes, such as Hü, the regenerator and savior, hence he became a trinity of infernal aspects, destroying and hating, a mixed-up Pan-like being (Pan is Capricorn), and this is the god of Abram, Isaac, and Jacob. Again, among the Jews and Phœnicians we find that their god was god of clouds and darkness, that his worship originated in fear, that he was symbolized by a burning fire, supernal, infernal, and eternal. His eyes were as a flame, a river of brimstone flowed from his mouth, a river of fire from under his throne, and his feet as a fiery furnace.

He was an avenger; it was fearful to fall into his hands, and he laughed and mocked at the misery of mankind.

He destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah with his favorite elements, and overwhelmed the earth with a flood. Other religions teach that this was the devil.

He was placed in the symbol of Scorpio, his Levites were in the same sign. And they were priestsof this symbol-serpent, dragon, or devil. After the captivity in Babylon, they had learned more. And the leading Jews were ashamed to find that the principle of evil had been from time immemorial set up as their deity. In like manner the Christian fathers, having discovered their mistake, changed the order of priesthood from Levi to Judah, or Hü Dad in Eilir (sun in Aries), and claimed it to be of the order of Melchisedek, i. e., order of the bardic Gorsedh of Druids.

We find that the Gnostics, Ophites, and Manicheans (being more versed than others in the fragments of Druidic lore extant among the Magians) asserted at the commencement of the Christian era that the Jewish God was the Evil One deified, and Celsus also accuses the Christians of trying to resuscitate the old doctrin of the logos, which they did not understand.

Furthermore, all those nations which had deified the evil principle believed that Adon was his son and not the son or vicegerent of Ion, who dwelt in space, as it is in the original bardism. Hence they call the angel of the bottomless pit Abadom, i. e., father of Adon, the divine son. (And they had a king over them which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abadon, but in the Greek hath his name Appolyon—Apollo.—Rev. ix, 11). The Jews again did not esteem the utterance of the word as the most harmonious music ever heard, but rather as the word which made the demons fear and tremble, corresponding nearly to the Diaspad of Druidism, the discordant sound representing the name of Avagdhu, the demoniac howl. The circumcision and emasculation are typical also of the Said Wrn (sun's loss of energy). The strongest proof is, as before stated, that the Hebrew God delighted in slaughter and sacrifice, demanding and receiving a ransom; even the first-born male child, even demanding the sacrifice of his own only begotten son Jesus Christ.

To understand the foregoing it is necessary to explain and to bear in mind that in the primitiv bardism, Hü, the savior, or light, was the son of God, only begotten and first-born of Ion of space, and the black virgin of Arthan (chaos and night). Having adopted the Evil One as their deity, this sect therefore were compelled to adapt the ideas to fit this by making Hü the son of the Evil One, as Ab-Adon; and as Hü died annually as the IAW-on—atonement to the Evil One, the idea was established that he died to appease the wrath of his father, and by his hand, as it were, and that he was the good God who acted thus, and as Avagdhu slew the first-born of living and green things and claimed it as a right in the old bardic idea, so "everything that opened the matrix is mine, saith the Lord."

And it is apparent that when this blood-sacrifice idea was prevalent thousands of children must hav been slaughtered among the oriental nations. Though this terrific deity was known by as many names as there were dialects, each one of them means some one of the attributes of the sun-god.

Sanchoniatho confirms this idea in his writings, and states that in the famous myth of the Phœnicians concerning their King Il (Chronos-Saturn), identical with El of the Jews, that he when the nation was afflicted by war, took his only begotten son Ieoud, dressed him in kingly robes, and sacrificed him as an atonement to this deity; as the king of Moab is also said to hav done. An expert in oriental terms will understand that the boast of the Jews that they are the children of Ab-Ram makes them simply the children of the Evil One, i. e., the children of Saturn (Il, El, Moloch, Chronos, Mammon), god of war and blood sacrifice; also as descendants of Heber (Ebr, On—Adon), called also Rama, Isaac, Ieoud; they are the same. Rama is the oriental word for zodiac, and there Rachel wept for her children, etc. There are many other strong indications that the Jews and their ideas are simply offshoots of the great Hindoo nation and theology, worshipers of Siva and Mahadeva; and their great myth of Abram offering Isaac* is identical with the Phœnician myth of Ieoud, while the Jews in the oriental tongues are called Ieoudim, sons of Ieoud, or Judah, and in the Old Testament they were called children of Belial, Bel, Baal; and in the New they are taunted with "Your father, the devil."

There is ample proof that the Hebrews were guilty of sacrificing their children according to the practice common at the time, slaying and burning them in reality, and not simply consecrating them, as later writers assert. For proof see Ezek. xx, 26 (And I polluted them in their own gifts, in that they ceased to pass through the fire, all that openeth the womb, that I might make them desolate, to the end that they might know that I am the Lord); Psalms cvi, 37, 38 (Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils. And shed innocent blood, the blood of their sons and daughters whom they sacrified unto the idols of Canaan); Jer. vii, 31 (And they hav built the high places of Tophet, which is in the valley of the sons of Hinnon, to burn their sons and daughters in the fire); Ezek. xvi, 21, 22 (That thou hast slain my children and delivered them to cause them to pass through the fire for them); and Ezek. xxiii, 37, 39 (That they hav committed adultery, and blood is in their hands; with their idols hav they committed adultery, and hav also caused their sons whom they bore unto me to pass for them through the fire to devour them. For when they had slain their children to their idols, then they came the same day into my sanctuary to profane it).

Undoubtedly thousands of children were slain in the commemoration of the Passover and feast of the Covenant in the early history of the Jews; and in the present day inhabitants of the Danubian principalities accuse them of such practices, and make it lively for them once in a while. But as the Hebrews became better acquainted with the old fragmentary Celtic ideas, still extant among the oriental nations, they adapted their deity more to the attributes of Hü—as Alawn in Eilir (Aries), later Plennydh, the causer of life, and the logos, from Hefin (Cancer), finally becoming the triple I. A. Oh, Jehovah, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This triple deity was supposed to overshadow the ark, while his triple ray focussed in the Shechinah as the God of the Covenant of Israel. And Ia-hoh with them, as with the Druids, represented the mystic name of God, the Mirific Word (Memra, Logos), Creator, Sustainer, Leader, Joshua, Jesus. And as Hü is sometimes called the Winged One, so Jehovah took form as Angel of the Covenant, Archangel, Angel of the Ark. And as Hü was one in many deified attributes, so Jahoh was Lord of Lords—very God of very Gods.

In Exodus it is stated that Moses, the Hebrew, received the mystic name first, yet in Genesis it is given to Abram, and we find it traceable in oriental myths ages previous to either period assigned.*

In course of time the Jews, having learned more of the attributes of Hü, and having attained a deeper insight into these mysteries, and knowing that he represented a beneficent deity in his triple manifestations as Plennydh, Alawn, and Gwron, entirely different to the attributes of the Principle of Evil, formerly worshiped by them, a reorganizing and patching up of the old ideas took place; and though having a knowledge of the mystic name, they held it to represent, not the melodious, but the awful name, and still adhered to the belief that their Jehovah was the author of all evil and misfortune. This belief was the result of the captivity in Babylon, where they had been imbued with higher ideas to a certain extent. Later Satan, the opposer, took form as a separate entity in their theology.

Jehovah was still the God of darkness, of vengeance, of fire and brimstone, delighting in plunder and murder, claiming the first-born, and demanding sacrifice and burnt-offering as much as ever, while his altars blazed and the air was thick with smoke of burning carcasses, and this was a sweet savor in his nostrils. Daily, winter and summer, year after year, still his hunger was never satisfied. It is claimed that traces of the ash-heaps of burnt animals are visible in Palestine to this day, identifying the locality of those temples of devil-worship.

The Druids esteemed Hü as the god of peace, the god of blessing, while war was the peculiar attribute of the opposer, Devil, while Jehovah was said to be a man of war, Lord of host, and God of battles, and under his leadership they claimed to hav been victorious over their enemies, and to have possessed the land of Canaan; and by his command, Nana Sahib-like, the inhabitants were devoted to fire and sword. Man and woman, from the infirm to the suckling babe, were put to death, and the greatest cruelties ever chronicled were perpetrated in his name. Of him and them we can only say,

> Oh, they were fiends!
> But what was he who taught them that God
> Of nature and benevolence had given
> A special sanction to the trade of blood?

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

*When we know, and hav proof to sustain our position, that the God whom the Jews claim that they hav descended from is Saturn—Sadwrn—and that Abram is only the incarnated myth of the same idea, it is not surprising that the Jews believed of that ancient cromlech on Mount Moriah that it was the altar of Abram, where he offered Isaac, and named by him Jehovah Jireh. This fact of its being an altar of sacrifice where a father offers his son proves the identity of the deity, that he is the destroyer, and not the Giver of Life—black Saturn, not Hu of light.

Many of these Druidic circles still stood in Palestine during the time of the Jews, but they called them threshing-floors; thus the threshing-floor of Arnan, or Arannah (i. e., Arawn), the Jebusite, where the ark abode after its return from the Philistines.

Another coincidence is that here the angel of the Lord smote him who attempted to steady the ark, and slew him; sometimes as the Lord, sometimes as his angel, but still the destroyer.

Rare Researches.

[A discussion of the question of the historical existence of Jesus has been going on in the National Republican of Washington, D. C. It began with an article signed "Iconoclast," which drew out several on the Christian side, not only in the Republican but in the Post (Democratic). We copy from the Republican of June 16 the following.]

A "student" sends the Republican the following: Of the heathen witnesses summoned to prove a historical Jesus, Josephus and Pontius Pilate are the only contemporaries. Pliny, Suetonius, and Tacitus wrote early in the second century; the rest of the heathen writers, as well as the Christian fathers, are rather too late, or two vague, to be of any value. Josephus wrote about A. D. 93. The great theologian, Dr. Dionysius Lardner, gave up Josephus as a witness one hundred and fifty years ago. Not only did Dr. Lardner prove the celebrated passage about the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus to be an interpolation of the third or fourth century, but he admitted that in another place, after the mention of the death of James, the brother of Jesus, the words, "who was called Christ," are probably an interpolation. And a distinguished Christian author, now living, Rev. S. Baring-Gould, says: "It is singular that neither Philo, Josephus, nor Justus of Tiberias should hav ever alluded to Christ or to primitiv Christianity" (Lost and Hostile Gospels, p. 1).

Tacitus, if he wrote the "annals," must hav done so after 117. But that the "annals" were forged by Poggio Bracciolini, A. D. 1429, and later, is now a demonstrated fact. See "Tacitus and Bracciolini," London, 1878. Pliny was governor of Bithynia A. D. 103. We hav "The Letters of Pliny," in ten books. They doubtless existed at the close of the second century, for Tertullian, A. D. 210, refers to them. What he says about the punishment of Christians in Bithynia amounts to nothing as proof of the existence of a Jesus in the reign of Tiberius. Is it not singular that Pliny should hav preserved nine books of letters written by himself and not one of the answers thereto? But in his tenth book he givs one hundred and twenty-two letters to and from the emperor Trajan. In a note to No. 1 the editor says that some critics hav inferred from the different style of the letters to Trajan that they are the production of another hand. However that may be, I undertake to say that I can show from internal evidence that the correspondence between Pliny and Trajan is a forgery, and I suspect that all the other letters of Pliny are forgeries also. Anyhow, the one referring to the Christians is self-contradictory and certainly spurious.

Suetonius wrote about A. D. 110. All he says is that "Christians, a race of men of a new and villainous, wicked, or magical superstition, were visited with punishment," and that Claudius (A. D. 41-54) "drove the Jews out of Rome, who, at the instigation of Chrestus, were constantly rioting." Dr. Lardner doesn't think he meant Christ. Who now believes he did?

Pilate is a strange witness. Tertullian (A. D. 210) calls Pilate a Christian, and says he sent an account to Tiberius of everything relating to Christ. Yes, indeed, you will find it all in "The Apocryphal Acts and Gospels," Antinicene Library. It is a very brief and meager account, and when you have read it all tell me how much of it you believe.

Not only will you find Pilate's letter to Tiberius, but to Augustus, who died A. D. 14, and to Claudius, who reigned from A. D. 41 to 54, and how Pilate was tried at Rome for what he had done in Judea, was convicted and beheaded; and, again, how he anticipated the execution by killing himself, and his body was sunk first in the Tiber and then in the Rhone at Via Gehenna (i. e., Vienna, or "way of hell"), where it caused such a disturbance that it was taken and removed to Lausanne; again, that he was banished to Gaul and drowned himself in Lake Lucerne; and there is said to be a monument to St. Pilate fifty-two feet high now at Vienne on the Rhone.

That "Death Warrant of Jesus Christ," cited by Mr. Bray, is a clumsy fraud. It has Annas and Caiaphas high priests at the same time. Annas was high priest from A. D. 12 to 21; Caiaphas from 23 to 36 (McClint. and Strong's Cyc.) It makes Pontius Pilate governor of Lower Galilee (i. e., the region about Lake Tiberius). Herod Antipas was tetrarch of that division of Palestine, and Pilate was procurator of Judea only.

It fixes the date of the execution March 24. Smith's Bible Dictionary says the date was April 8, and Chambers' Encyclopedia says the Jewish Passover never occurs before March 26, which precludes March 24. Furthermore, any learned Hebrew will tell you that the Jews never tried or executed anybody on the great Passover day, and that it never was allowed to fall on Friday. Yet the first three gospels all say that the crucifixion took place on Friday, the great day of the Passover.

Lastly, there is no year between A. D. 28 and 33, inclusiv, when the 14th of Nisan, or Passover Day, fell on a Friday when there was a full moon (McClint. and Strong's Cyclopedia). The Jewish Talmud makes no mention of a Jesus crucified in the reign of Tiberius, but it does frequently refer to a Jesus who was stoned and hanged about 75 B. C. for sorcery. (Lost and Hostile Gospels).

Paul was probably a disciple of that Jesus, and that Paul flourished before the Christian era is proved by his own writings. In 2 Cor. xi, 32, he says, "In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me." Now we know from Josephus and other sources that Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, held Damascus for many years prior to 63 B. C., when all Syria, Damascus included, became a part of the Roman empire. And though there were other later kings of Arabia Petrea named Aretas—one even as late as A. D. 37, who fought and defeated his son-in-law Herod, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Jos. Antiq. xviii, 5)—yet it does not appear that the last-named Aretas ever acquired any part of the Roman territory. Nor, indeed, was it possible for such a petty king to hav marched an army two hundred and fifty miles and taken the strong city of Damascus out of the hands of the Romans. The idea is simply preposterous. There is no other clew to dates in Paul's genuin epistles; those to Timothy and Titus are spurious and late, while the book of Acts is unhistorical and fabulous from beginning to end.

*The myth of Moses receiving the divine name is but an imitation of Menw, son of the three shouts, receiving the word, i. e., the name. The whole history of Moses is mythical—his leadership forty years in the desert, tabernacle, and laws are but an imitation of what Ezra had learned from the books of the Chaldeans. But he made the mistake of placing too late a date for the exploits of Moses, as other histories show that the word, name, logos, was extant countless ages before the date assigned for Moses.

Scribner's Embrace of Comstock.

"Bray a fool in a mortar, yet will his foolishness not depart from him," is a proverb of an old book which its special advocates seem to prove true by furnishing themselvs as examples. It is the fate of Bourbons and bigots not to be able to learn or to forget anything. They are merely creatures of brute instinct. To be pachyderm is at once their glory and their defense; for the very gods of intelligence are impotent against stupidity. The finest artillery can do nothing against earth-works which simply bury the balls and don't know what has happened. This kind of barbarous, brutal, insensible, semi-hypocritical quasi-orthodox, and would-be respectable stolidity is just the kind of material to be shoveled up as a defense of Comstockism and all of its enormities and absurdities. Of this quality of heart and mind the last Scribner's Monthly appears as a fine example. Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, it seems, sent to that magazine a plain and conclusiv statement of the true position of this whole subject under a republican form of government. He did this evidently so that Scribners' might not again repeat the blunders which made its review of Comstock's book, "Frauds Exposed," a disgrace to American literature.

Mr. Palmer wasted his time and statesmanship on a specimen that will hav to be brayed in something besides a logical mortar before his foolishness will depart or even become apparent to himself.

That magazine thinks it a smart thing to print Mr. Palmer's article, and then to show how bravely stupid and impervious to reason it can be by repeating the same blunders in, if possible, a form more stolid and insulting than ever.

It is worth while to notice a dozen or so of this specimen's blunders, not that it will do this bigot who wrote them any good, but to show the friends of liberty the dangers that threaten our free institutions from this kind of "respectable" ignorance, stupidity, and malice which he illustrates.

1. This editor thinks that the plea that it is difficult "to define obscenity is quite frivolous."

Like every tyro he thinks he could do it right off, and doubtless he could in his way, for he "knows a rotten apple from a sound one." But, as Mr. Palmer pointed out in his article, when "a great man, statesman, and jurist" like Livingstone meets the subject as he did in preparing his criminal code for Louisiana, he finds that this shallow apple theory won't work and expresses himself that a safe legal definition is impossible.

Livingstone did with great hesitation try a partial definition in his code, but the code was rejected, and no one has been able to make a formal definition of this purely relativ offense by which citizens may not be punished by loss of property and liberty, according to the mere fancy of others. The complaint and experience is that any statute, test, or legal definition is inevitably an instrument of wrong and tyranny. The whole matter must be left to the jury as judges of the law and the facts of each case in regard to obscene libels, as our Constitution prescribes shall be done in all other libels. That is the only true because the safest solution. Unless that is done the judge determins the whole matter by his construction of the test.

The editor says that the "test of obscenity was established long ago by the highest court in England, and has been sustained in America in all the cases tried under our laws."

This is not true. The so-called "test" introduced by Judge Benedict in the United States District Court of this district is from the case of the Queen vs. Hicklin (II. Cox Criminal Cases, p. 19).

It was there used to describe some of the effects of obscenity, and in nowise as a definition or test. The use of it for this latter purpose is a most dangerous perversion, against which Americans are justified in making the most strenuous protest. The words are these:

"Whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those minds which are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of the sort may fall."

These words were proper and innocent enough for the purpose for which they were originally used, but they are most dangerous when made a formal test of crime under our institutions. Almost anything—from the Bible to the New York Herald—may be condemned under them. There is no safety but the favor of the judge. In the court where that "test" prevails Mr. Comstock could boast, "We always convict in this court."

But it is not true that the other courts of America hav followed this test. The state courts hav generally modified or rejected it, and hav practically left the whole question to the jury. There is infinit danger in allowing any other course to be pursued. The common sense of the jury, unbiased and unshackled by courts or tests, is the only hope for liberty in offenses of an indefinit and relativ nature.

2. The editor asserts that not one of the evils which Mr. Palmer thinks to be "involved in the Comstock laws hav been realized."

This is not true; in fact, the evils pointed out by him hav been abundantly realized. But the frame of mind that advises our citizens "to sit still until they are hit" is the old way in which well-to-do respectability prophesies smooth things. It simply plays into the hands of bigotry and tyranny until our liberties are undermined and lost. President Madison's words ought to be burnt into the brains of such advisers until they can learn to heed them: "It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberty. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The freemen of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much to forget it."

That this editor is too ignorant or stupid or indifferent to know that evils do exist under those laws is unfortunate to him; but that he should hav a magazine to propagate his ignorance in is unfortunate to those who are imposed upon by him and to the country. These evils hav been clearly pointed out and summarized in the sixth resolution of the National Liberal League, passed at the Chicago Congress, 1880, and reprinted again and again, the last time in Mr. Wakeman's speech at Albany, lately published, pp. 43–45.

These evils hav never been shown to be unreal or imaginary. They are insidious, but are really the greatest dangers that now impend over our republic. Let any one read Mr. Wakeman's speech, above referred to, and be indifferent if he can.

3. The editor says, "No innocent man has suffered through the Comstock laws." This we deny personally and emphatically. The man who makes this broad assertion states what he does not and cannot know. He is a mere partisan, and thereby puts himself beyond the pale of fair and gentlemanly opponents. He asserts thereby that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER was guilty. He indorses on his own responsibility that wicked prosecution and the sufferings and losses which it entailed upon us. That prosecution and trial involved and was carried through by outrages upon the law and the citizen for which a day of reckoning will yet come. The editor who indorses in this reckless way that last great outrage on the American press will find time to regret it if he is not too stupid to know what regret is. This editor does, by his assertion, also indorse the thirty odd cases of outrage and persecution collected in our little book called "Anthony Comstock; His Career of Cruelty and Crime." Does he also indorse the fifteen cases of suicide caused and boasted of by Anthony? Is that, in his judgment, a proper method of legal proceeding?

4. The editor says, "Practically there is no danger in these laws."

If the editor of Scribner's had shared the experiences of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER his judgment on the question of practical danger would be far different, and also worth far more than it is. The latter editor at the conclusion of his trial issued a circular to the press, showing seven particulars in which the rights of the accused had been stricken down under the execution of these laws in the matter of the trial only. These dangers were practical, and form a precedent that must now be obviated by legislation. The dangers under the state Comstock laws above referred to were found practical. The dangers under the United States Comstock laws are none the less so. As the N. Y. Sun says, "If the Post-office may discriminate for a good purpose it may discriminate for a bad purpose." It has discriminated already so that the press of America is now under an actual censorship far beyond that of England or Canada.

5. The editor justifies decoy and says, "The accused decoys his victim—the decoy business is all on the other side." Well, suppose it is; does that justify the law officer in becoming a criminal too? It is not simply a question of cuteness between a rogue and a detectiv, as the editor seems to think. The community at large is the main party involved, and when it condescends to employ others to do a mean thing for it, the whole community sinks to the level of that meanness. There is a square, honest, honorable way of enforcing all laws, and that is in the end the only effectiv way. The "moral" respectability that sanctions this decoy and mail espionage of Comstockism would hav society set a thief to catch a thief, because morally it is not above the thief, and only has hypocrisy to prevent its being one.

The legislature of this state has given the proper answer to this editor's morality by passing a law preventing these Comstockish decoys and spies from being witnesses in any court of justice. The editor may learn from this law a higher notion of what is "mean and immoral" for the state to do. He evidently has not advanced as yet beyond the church morality of the Inquisition and the Jesuits, but the people of New York hav.

6. The editor says that unless we support this decoy business as a part of public law we "trifle with facts."

That is his way of asserting that the offenses referred to cannot be suppressed unless the whole state by its laws puts itself upon the level with the offender and even lower. The Liberals refuse to believe this until actual trial has been made. They say the state has unlimited power which it can exercise in honest and honorable ways. It may change the laws of evidence: it may compel evidence. The juries are interested in the welfare and purity of the community, and will sustain all honest and reasonable efforts in that behalf. But the Comstockians refuse to second such fair secular laws and efforts. They insist upon the union of church and state for the punishment of these offenses, and they insist upon corrupting the laws and the state by bringing into them the worst processes and abuses of the church. That their motiv is wrong is proved by their refusal to return to a responsible and secular administration in place of their amateur semi-theological societies.

7. The editor says, that the good results "vindicate the right of the Comstock laws to remain upon the statute book."

This assumes that these good results cannot be attained without the bad results and dangers experienced, and which certainly impend from these laws. This assumption begs the whole question, and is controverted by facts and the offer of new secular laws that will be more effective for good and free from these objections. The most cruel, ridiculous, and absurd laws may hav some good results—indeed they always hav—but that does not "vindicate their right to remain upon the statute book." The laws of Draco, and the Connecticut Blue laws, would be "vindicated" by this sort of reasoning. Of course this editor would not reason in this way but for a purpose. He must know better.

8. The editor next illustrates his ignorance by reference to the Committee of Seventy, who "rid this city of the Tweed Ring," and the Committee of Twenty-one who tried to get laws passed to hav our streets cleaned. There is no analogy whatever between such committees and these Comstock laws. If these committees backed by our churches had got themselvs incorporated to enforce the laws instead of the regular officers, and by means abhorent to the common laws of the land, and common morals, and common sense, then there would hav been some sense in referring to them in this connection. But such committees were committees appointed by citizens only for purposes of persuasion and to influence the regular law officers, the legislature, and the citizens generally.

They were in fact what Mr. Wakeman wished, in the bill now before the legislature, introduced by Mr. Andrews, to hav the Comstock societies reduced to. The editor objects to this bill only because it "wipes out the legal functions of these [Comstock] Societies." Those "legal functions" which the editor contends for make the reference to voluntary committees of citizens by way of comparison absurd. Such unincorporated committees, without "legal functions," those who oppose Comstockism warmly approve. They often very usefully voice and influence public opinion, but they must not replace the law, or the law officers of the state. If they do there is no end to the evils and dangers which will result even from them.

9. The editor shows his bias and motiv to be purely sectarian by his next assertion that the only motiv of Liberalism is "moral dirt."

He ironically asks "to be pardoned" for introducing Mr. F. E. Abbot, from whom he cites to prove this assertion. This pardon cannot be granted. He knows that Mr. Abbot is no fair witness on this subject. He knows that it was a betrayal of liberty that caused him to be defeated as President of the League and drove him from the Liberal ranks. He knows that in his bitter disappointment he embraced Comstockism and has since done his best to prove how "foul the bird is that dirties his own nest." The very men who would hav been models of all that was good if they had voted for him for President of the League became devils as soon as they did not. When Benedict Arnold is taken as the proper witness as to the character and motivs of Washington and his compatriots, because he was "intimately" acquainted with them, F. E. Abbot will become the proper witness as to the motivs of the National Liberal League.

10. The editor, in the same spirit, says of the Liberals who were a majority of the League, "Their prominent organ announced their platform to be immediate, unconditional, and permanent repeal of all laws against obscenity, whether municipal, state, or national."

There is no truth in this quotation, which is from Mr. Comstock's book, and is a fair specimen of his falsehood. No member or organ of the League, or any one who ever had anything to do with it, ever made or indorsed this position. It was an extreme statement of Mr. Heywood, one of Comstock's victims, who is and was always a consistent and persistent opponent of the League because it was, and always has been, in favor of proper secular laws on this very subject.

Why did not the editor find out the truth about this quotation before he used it? Mr. Wakeman had fully exposed the falsehood of this quotation in the speech above referred to. Why was it necessary for this editor to repeat it?

11. The editor's closing sentences show why he repeats the slanders or Mr. Comstock and Mr. Abbot plainly enough. He thinks it would be grateful to his employers to abuse Liberals, and he thinks any stone is good enough to throw at a dog they wish to be killed. The morality he discloses is that of the Hoodlum—"Hit him ag'in, he's got no friends." He shares the common notion that it is a popular and praiseworthy, and apparently a safe, thing to abuse and retail falsehoods about Liberals, and that it pays very well. That is the transparent motiv of the reply to Mr. Palmer's article. Mr. Palmer mistook this man for a gentleman—treated him as a fair man, desirous of learning the truth, and capable of appreciating the real motivs of an earnest and honest body of men and women who, through evil report, hav sacrificed much that is dear to them in the defense of the liberties of those who know no better than to abuse them for it. But this editor is no candid man, willing to honestly understand and appreciate the motivs of those he had unwittingly wronged. He is simply a hired assassin of bigotry, ready to do its bidding. The old feudal magnates of church and state kept their hired assassins and bravos, who would use the dagger, the bludgeon, or poison upon those their masters wished to destroy. The modern successors of the same influences find it cheaper and more in harmony with the times to keep a "respectable" press with its hired editors for a similar purpose. The antislavery people had to stand a regular war of assassination from these hirelings. The Liberals hav now succeeded to the honor of stealthy abuse, slanders, and falsehoods from the same source. The creatures who sell their brains and their pens (for real souls they hav none) to this base trade of sectarian and partisan detraction must be exposed. They must be made to understand that their trade is well known and no longer safe. They must understand that there will be blows to receive as well as to giv. When they advertise their ignorance and malice, as this editor has done, after a gentleman has shown him better, the advertisment must be continued until they are sick of it. The only way to teach such creatures decency is to rub their noses in their own filth until they get enough of it. There is now a TRUTH SEEKER and a Liberal press that can make these light-penned gentry sensible of the real infamy of their conduct, or at least can make others sensible of it, if they hav lost the perception.

12. Finally, "vicious inclination" is all that this editor sees in the struggle of Liberals led by such men as Hon. Elizur Wright, James Parton, and Courtlandt Palmer to secure an impartial and responsible administration of the laws. "Vicious inclination" is the real trouble with the editor, and the reason that his sight is so short and cross-eyed. Any candid man cannot help but feel that the cause supported by such men amid a shower of obloquy must hav some solid bottom. The fair way for an impartial editor would be to recognize from their own standpoint the truth and the reform for which they contend, as well as the position of their opponents.

The charge of "vicious inclination" proves at once the incompetency of the editor who uses it to be a judge in the matter at all. There never was a reform or forward step in human progress, from early Christianity down to this day, that did not hav to meet this charge of vicious inclination from those whose interest in the old abuses made them blind to any other motiv except the one that would actuate them, if they had the courage to act out their own inclination. Such charges can now only recoil on those who make them. Nothing tended more to effect the defeat of Mr. Comstock at Albany last winter than the very slanders which this editor retails after him against men far better than their slanderers. People who think that the Liberal movement in defense of our liberties can be ridiculed or slandered out of existence are beginning to learn their mistake. Editors, instead of swallowing Mr. Comstock's stories whole, had better find out what is true in his book and what his opponents really mean from some other source. For, as Mr. J. S. Mill lays down, unless you "understand and beat your opponent at his best, you are beaten by him." In this way the enemies of the Liberal cause are doing all they can to further it, and the editor of Scribner's has volunteered as the meanest and stupidest of all.

W. F. JAMIESON has given seven lectures in Mongo, Indiana, four of them being delivered in a pretty grove. It was a pleasing sight to see the long line of carriages. The whole country seemed to turn out. Mr. Jamieson will hold grove meetings Sundays, July 10th and 17th, near Nottaway, Michigan. He will receive calls for the Sundays of July 24th and 31st, and August 17th. Address Albion, Michigan.

A Reception.

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, with his better half, will next week, previous to his long journey, visit his only sister, residing near Rochester, N. Y. While in the vicinity a meeting of friends will take place on Thursday evening, July 7th, at the house of Mrs. Amy Post, 36 Sophia street. It will be very pleasant to meet the friends on that occasion. All in the vicinity are cordially invited.

Round-the-World Fund.

The following persons hav pledged five dollars each (one share) to help take THE TRUTH SEEKER editor round the world. Those preceded by an asterisk (*) hav already paid. Those not paid will oblige by remitting promptly. Two or three volumes of the book descriptiv of the journey will be issued to each contributor as soon as ready.

Our sincere thanks are extended to those friends who hav kindly sent in their five dollars to help us around the world. We trust none will regret the investment. If those not having a star attached to their name will allow us to add one, we will be obliged to them. The sooner the stars are attached to every name the sooner we will be ready to start on the long journey.

We do not wish to urge those upon whose pledges we decided to make the journey, but will remark that those who wish their contributions to reach us before we start will hav to remit with very little delay. We think all the sums will be needed. If others feel to join the starry galaxy they will be welcome. The names of the donors will be published in Vol. I. of the work descriptiv of the journey.

A Preventiv of Vice.

[Up to the time we go to press Gov. Cornell has not signed the Anti-Comstock bill. The Herald of June 23d has the following on the subject.]

Assemblyman Murphy's bill to discourage a certain class of informers has passed both houses of the legislature and deserves to become a law. It provides, in effect, that when a man asks or persuades a man or woman to sell rum on Sunday, keep a disorderly house, or in any other manner violate a penal statute, the evidence of that man shall not be received against the offender unless the informer can show that he was acting under the orders of a prosecuting officer. It is unnecessary to say that the bill is directed at some over-zealous agents of societies, these agents having themselvs induced many persons to break the law. Undoubtedly it is hard to secure evidence that will convict a certain class of offenders, but men who are mean enough to coax others to violate a penal statute are quite likely to be mean enough to commit perjury if by so doing they can put money into their pockets. There is no moral gain to the community in making a new set of rogues merely for the purpose of suppressing an old one.

An Appeal for A. B. Davis.

MR. BENNETT AND READERS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: It is said to be more blessed to giv than to receive. Unless you hav tested this, please do so now. A. B. Davis, a printer, whose office was broken open and effects destroyed eight years ago at Clinton, Mass., because he published in tract form radical views, and would not cater to the prejudice of ignorant people, now lies sick with remittent fever at Brentwood, Long Island, where he has been housed and cared for by a woman, who now is also sick. They are without what are necessaries of life in health, and now most sadly in need. Mr. Davis has been too good and valuable a man, too earnest and sincere a reformer, to be left to suffer in such a severe illness as this. He is extremely thin in flesh, not at all the A. B. Davis that he was when publishing the Battle-Axe. Brothers, come to the rescue, and aid from you too, sisters, will be welcome. Send donations to A. B. Davis, Brentwood, Long Island, N. Y. MRS. SCOTT BRIGGS.

No inquirer can fix a direct and clear-sighted gaze towards truth, who is casting side-glances all the while on the prospects of his soul.—Dr. Markham.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Nineteenth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I suppose you consider your last letter a model of brevity and logic. I shall not attempt to destroy the illusion. I might remark, however, that it is not the first time you have striven to make it appear that I am wasting time and, after promising a short review, fulfilled the promise by making your reply twice as long.

The coarse recapitulation of the spots which the Bible in its truthfulness would not hide, even on the lives of the best of men, is consistent with the spirit of Infidelity. The coarseness is, however, not in the Bible, but in the mind of the critic. The biblical narratives are neither flippant or coarse. To be consistent you should object to all medical works and rake together all the chapters on diseases which are not mentioned except to the family physician as evidences of their obscenity. You should call all histories obscene, for adultery and murder, rapine and outrage, are chronicled on the pages of every true history. You should denounce all our legal codes as impure, and select such portions of them as define unnatural lusts as unimpeachable proof. This is an exact analogy of many of the examples you allege from the scriptures. The Levitical laws, etc., were the statute books of the Jewish nation. You should also remember that the fastidious delicacy of the present day is no standard by which to judge the artless plainness of speech of the earlier ages. But anything, it seems, however inconsistent or puerile, is argument against the Bible. Faugh! how disgusting the affectation of purity in a system whose books of devotion are Rousseau's "Confessions," Voltaire's "Pucelle," Diderot's works, and even "Cupid's Yokes!" However, why not quote the scriptures themselves instead of giving your own synopsis, and let the reader judge? He will find no elaborated praise of evil, no cloaking of sin in alluring guise, such as the works of prominent Infidels exhibit. Where vice is recorded it is photographed as a deformity that it may be hated and avoided.

You have hinted in the close of your letter what you remarked to me in a private conversation, that the latter propositions should have been so framed that the affirmative would have fallen to me. I had intended, as you will recollect by referring to my first reply, to take the initiative in certain propositions which want of time now prevents, and part of which, however, have been examined and would therefore be unnecessary even if time permitted. I will therefore repeat the last four theses. They read as follows:

Fifth thesis. The doctrines and claims of Christianity have been a curse instead of a blessing to mankind in many respects. Instead of being a religion of love it has been a religion of hate, contention, war, and bloodshed.

It has fostered ignorance, superstition, and falsehood, and has retarded education and science in the world.

It recognizes and supports the most obnoxious systems of kingcraft and priestcraft, upholding slavery, despotism, and every form of oppression in its assertion that all power is of God.

As a proof of the above, the leaders and bright stars of the Christian church have been among the worst tyrants and oppressors of human liberty the world has known.

Sixth thesis. The Bible and Christianity have been unprogressive in their nature. They are founded upon the dictum and authority of God himself, and are therefore incapable of progress and improvement. While all branches of art, mechanism, science, architecture, and agriculture are capable of progress, the Bible and Christianity admit of none.

Eighth thesis. The Bible and Christianity do not teach the highest class of truth and the best variety of religion which mankind are capable of receiving. They are of the past, not the present; and as they cost incomputable treasures in labor and money to sustain them, and as science, reason, and truth teach us a far better and truer religion at only a moiety of the other, the world should discard the former and embrace the latter.

I submit that the last two theses are of no weight whatever, the last one being, in reality, the summing up of your side of the debate, and its immediate predecessor being an absurdity. Manifestly, that which is really founded on "the dictum and authority of God" is the acme of progress—the perfect development of truth. An objection based on this ground, then, needs merely to be stated to be dismissed as folly. The theses, then, are narrowed down to two—in reality, one, for the sixth proposition is merely a corollary of the fifth. For our present purpose, I will recast it as follows:

CONCLUDING THESIS.

The Bible presents in Christianity a system of morality which, faithfully obeyed, would bless the whole world and train the human race to the highest point of progress; and even as it is, after centuries of strife and opposition, and at times world-wide apostacy on the part of its professed followers, it has been a source of incalculable blessing to the human race.

For the first part of the thesis the Bible must be its own witness. I note, then,

The religion of Christ is founded on love.

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God sent not the Son into the world to judge the world, but that the world should be saved through him" (John iii, 16, 17).

"In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (1 John iv, 9, 10).

Revealing the love of God to men, it asks for a return of love from men to God for his mercy and grace, and it also inculcates universal love toward all and the uprooting from the heart and mind of every feeling and thought and the abstinence from every act that is not an expression of this love.

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction" (James i, 27).

"If thou fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well" (James ii, 28).

"If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?" (1 John iv, 7).

What is the root of all the evil in the world? The heart of men, undoubtedly, reason and scripture alike teach. And what are the fruits? Pride, ambition, revenge, malice, anger, hatred, all these things. Now the Bible is emphatic in its denunciation of their nourishment. I will quote a few verses:

"Let nothing be done through strife and vainglory, but in lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than themselves" (Phil. ii, 3).

"Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall" (1 Cor. x, 12).

"Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath, for it is written, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord" (Rom. xii, 19).

"Let all bitterness and wrath and anger and clamor and evil speaking be put away from you with all malice" (Eph. iv, 31).

"Laying aside all malice and all guile" (1 Peter, ii, 1).

"Not rendering evil for evil or railing for railing" (1 Pet. iii, 9).

"Follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith we may edify another. . . It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak" (Rom. xix, 19–21).

"We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak and not to please ourselves. Let every one of us please his neighbor for his good to edification" (Rom. xv, 1, 2).

"If a man be overtaken in a fault . . . restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself lest thou also be tempted. . . . As we have, therefore, opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith" (Gal. vi, 1, 10).

"As ye would that men should do unto you do ye also to them likewise. If ye love them which love you, what thank have ye? for sinners also love those that love them. . . . But love ye your enemies, and do good and lend, hoping for nothing again" (Luke vi, 31, etc).

Such is the spirit of the gospel of Christ; such its precepts, such its morality. If they were universally acted upon, would it not convert our earth into a paradise? Is not, then, the doctrine of the New Testament emphatically one capable of blessing mankind? And inasmuch as we know that pride, selfishness, malice, revenge, etc., cause the suffering and sorrows in the world, must not that religion which teaches the opposite of these, be the best fitted to advance the interests of our race? If all men were humble, kind, affectionate, unselfish, not retaliating for injuries, would not the world, I again ask you, be an Eden?

But you retort, Christians are notoriously the reverse of faithful disciples. I admit it, but the scriptures are not responsible. Yet, as it is, Christianity has been of incalculable benefit to mankind. I will specify three prominent instances:

Christianity first taught mankind that they were and should live as brothers.

Christianity introduced that sympathy and relief for the sorrows and sufferings of mankind which is so largely an element of our present civilization; and thirdly,

Christianity alone elevated woman to her proper position; or more briefly,

(a) Christianity first taught the BROTHERHOOD OF MAN.

(b) Christianity introduced BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.

(c) Christianity alone ELEVATED WOMAN.

(a) In the ancient world, the world before the Christian era, the kinship of men was determined by national boundaries. To the Greek every other nation was "barbarian;" to the Roman all foreigners were "enemies;" to the Jew, proud of the gifts of Jehovah, he vainly imagined his individual person of more worth than the rest of the world. This hostile separation between nations the influence of Christianity has gradually overcome until different races where Christianity has been introduced no longer look upon each other as barbarians or enemies. The essential equality of all men before God, the equal invitation of all to partake of the blessings of the gospel, the equally cordial reception of the low and degraded, as well as the wealthy and refined, by the Lord Jesus, as well as the whole tenor of his doctrine, have produced this great change. It was not so before Christ; it is not so in lands where Christianity has no footing, however civilized they may be.

This same teaching has permeated all our civilization, even influencing Infidels in their motives and judgments, and has softened our laws, and given emphasis to the doctrines of individual rights as distinguished from the rights of the government. It has ennobled the poor, relieved the unfortunate, gradually given rights to the slave, ending in his manumission, removed out the torture and the rack in courts of justice, softened the horrors of war, and often prevented it.

(b) As a kindred consequence it has imparted to our civilization a softness of heart for others' sufferings, a sympathy, a benevolence, which were strangers to all the other civilizations. The benevolent societies, associations for the relief of the indigent, the value of human life, are the peculiar phases of Christianized life. The civilization of Rome, of Greece, of Babylon, Assyria, all the older civilizations, have no such characteristics. They are products of Christianity silently working upon the hearts and consciences of men.

(c) Before Christ, and even now, among nations that are civilized, but not Christianized, woman was and is the slave of man, at one time the cowering victim of his anger, at another the plaything of his lust. Under the benign protection of Christianity all this has been changed. Woman is now the happy companion of man, given equal and inalienable rights. The ban of Christ upon divorce, except for marital unfaithfulness, the sin of polygamy, the commands for mutual love, forbearance, faithfulness, and respect, all have been the gifts of Christianity to woman.

These are three distinctive triumphs of Christianity. I have merely stated them, not argued. I have said nothing of the leprous rottenness of the moral world at the time of the advent of Christ, when sins that are too vile to mention were the pastime of the refined and great of the pagan civilization. I shall have more to say of both when I see your reply to my position that moral exaltation, intellectual progress, and the surest happiness are the invariable accompaniments of an OPEN BIBLE.

Yours sincerely, G. M. MAIR.

Lecture Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: My pen has been silent through all these months in which the snow has faded away gradually, like the hopes of the human heart, silently; while the grasses hav crept up and the leaves hav looked out, and the sweet flowers hav beckoned to the bees to come and dwell among them. Coming or going, at work or at rest though we are, Nature goes right on, in her quiet way, replacing the old with the new.

My six weeks' labor in the City of Brotherly Love terminated on the evening of the 15th of May, upon which occasion a good-sized audience gathered to listen and to bid me good speed, selecting as their spokeswoman Mrs. Sada Bailey, whose fair face and friendly voice fitted well the poem, "Liberty and Brotherhood," which recently appeared in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Pleasant indeed would it be if on the highway of life we travelers could more frequently meet such friends and such appreciation; could hear oftener the words of praise and encouragement which buoy up the soul amid the breakers of doubt and despondency which sometimes beset the best of us. I cannot too warmly commend the zeal of the president of the Robert Burns Liberal League, Alfred Jenkins, and his co-workers T. H. Lee, Wm. Reilly, Alfred Gunn, and others. This little band of brave souls, as they endeavor to hold aloft the flag of liberty, should be strengthened and assisted by all who are emancipated from creeds, and whose numbers in Philadelphia must be considerabble, judging from the large audience which came out to laugh with the witty Col. Ingersoll on the occasion of his lecture in the Academy in May.

I can hardly explain the indifference of antichristians to the work of organization. It seems to me that if each disbeliever in Christianity could read Mr. Leland's telling article on "Ways and Means," he must be convinced of the necessity for united effort among Liberals. There is too great a tendency on the part of those who hav outgrown false theology to shirk the responsibility which a higher and nobler conception of life and its duties would appear to impose. If life is broader and more beautiful now than when we believed in gods and devils, why should not our work emphasize this truth, this conviction?

True, God is no longer dear, but humanity still remains, with all its myriad necessities; and for this, and to supply these, we must now exist.

So I thought as I speeded over the rails that fair May morning on my way to the good town of Port Jervis, where, through the winter, I labored, I trust not unworthily, for the happiness of my fellows. For two Sundays I remained among these friends dispensing the Freethought, as during the winter I had done, to large and interested audience. Port Jervis has reason to be proud of the large Liberal element which it contains, and which upon every occasion manifests its interest in the live questions of the day.

From this point I came to Binghamton, to find the League still alive and activ. Meetings were also being held on Sundays, morning and evening, by W. F. Peck, recently arrived from the West. His lectures are very highly spoken of, and considerable interest has been aroused by a debate he had last week with Dr. T. L. Brown, whose belligerency is well known to many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The question was "Immortality;" and while the audience, which appeared much mixed, was evidently much amused with the doctor's humorous remarks, made in a style peculiarly his, yet it was apparent that it was also greatly interested in Mr. Peck's vigorous attempt to establish the fact of continued existence by testimony like that of Professors Zöllner, Crookes, Wallace, and others, who, as scientists, hav turned their attention to the spiritual phenomena.

Bad as man is, unsatisfactory as is this material existence, yet the one longing above all others seems to be for an existence hereafter. To answer this question, If a man die shall he liv again? is the desire of the peasant and the philosopher. Upon this desire are built the dreams and labors of the better part of man's life.

Many think, your correspondent included, that the question has been settled in the affirmativ, but many more are still unconvinced, and, like the doctor, would giv one hundred dollars in gold to anybody who will produce a single veritable ghost. Well, let the battle go on. Facts will stand any test which may be applied.

The little season of rest which I hav enjoyed amid the foliage of June in this beautiful town of Binghamton will be broken, for this week I go northward to the somewhat historic town of Sackett's Harbor, where I should be glad to hear from any who may desire to arrange for lectures during July, August, or September. Address Sackett's Harbor, New York. MRS. H. S. LAKE.

June 19, 1881.

Letter from Colonel John R. Kelso.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I did think to begin this letter with a description of that wonderful natural phenomenon called mirage, which often converts the great sand plains of this far-famed valley (San Joaquin) into a fairy land more weird, more wonderful, and more beautiful than was ever pictured in fable, in story-book, or in song. I find, however, that this description would make my letter entirely too long. I will, therefore, send this description as an independent scientific article to the Investigator, and. in this letter proceed with an account of my travels, my observations, etc.

On the 27th of May I left Modesto and reached Galt, a lively railroad town of eight hundred inhabitants, about twenty-six miles west of Sacramento. I had promised a Liberal friend to giv this place a call on my way east, and I now fulfilled my promis, intending to lecture there if I could get a hall and an audience.

I found the only hall in the place engaged for two evenings, but at the solicitation of C. W. Harvey, a stanch Liberal, proprietor of the Harvey Hotel, I remained to lecture on Sunday evening. An effort was made by the Liberals to induce the Rev. Mr. Stewart, who was to preach in the only church in the place, to giv way and let me lecture in the church, and thus giv his benighted, half dozen followers a chance to hear the truth. This he of course declined to do, and hence I lectured in the hall. My audience was much larger than I expected, and was composed of the best citizens of the place. All seemed pleased with my lecture, and altogether my memory of the place will be a pleasant one.

On the 30th I again started eastward, lying over several hours at Sacramento, the capital of our great golden state. This city contains over twenty-two thousand inhabitants, and can boast some of the finest buildings, both public and private, on the Pacific coast. Taken altogether, however, it is not equal in beauty to Oakland and many other cities and towns of California.

At 8 P.M. I started onward again, bound for Reno. I fell asleep among the almost indescribably beautiful, semi-tropical scenes of central California, and awoke at sunrise among the desolate but wonderfully grand arctic scenery of the snow-capped Sierra Nevada. The change seemed like one of enchantment.

At about 8 o'clock A.M. of the 31st I reached Reno, Nev. This is a small, activ, and well-built city of three thousand inhabitants or more. It is situated on the left bank of the Truckee River, at the eastern base of the principal range of the Sierra Nevada. It stands in a basin which is nearly circular, and which is about twelve miles in diameter. About one-third of the rim of this basin is capped with snow, which, as it melts, sends down many sparkling streams of pure ice water. These streams would be worth millions could they reach your great and wicked city as they reach this.

Some of the land of this basin is very good for farming purposes, and is now covered with a fine crop of grass which the farmers and the grasshoppers are harvesting just as fast as they can. The grasshoppers are very sociable little creatures with wonderful appetites. They are making things rather lively in the hotel where I am now writing. The sensation which they produce as they strike me between the eyes or crawl lovingly upon my neck is growing a little monotonous. I will stop awhile.

Three hours later. I hav been out, rambling along the banks of the beautiful Truckee, bathing my hands and my face in its pure cold water, and feeling almost as buoyant as I felt over forty years ago, when in like manner I bathed my hands and my face in the waters of the bright brooklets that help form the far away Ohio. Indeed there is something exhilarating in the very atmosphere of this strange land in which at one view you behold the frigid desolation of the polar regions, the burning barrenness of the great desert, and the beautiful luxuriance of the tropics.

The grasshoppers seem to be increasing in numbers and in audacity. As I came up the stairs a few minutes ago several dozen came skipping joyfully up before me to see whither I was going and what I was going to eat. While I was out I saw many thousands perched upon the shady side of a large church, while their millions of brethren, to whom they continually made signals, were rapidly devouring the grass upon the consecrated grounds adjoining. A moment's observation made known to me the fact that those upon the church were listening to ascertain whether in this church any such foolish prayers were being offered up to their heavenly father against them as were offered up in the churches of Missouri a few years ago against the brethren of their great-grandfathers. Hearing no such prayers from the more intelligent people of Nevada, these listening grasshoppers assumed a happy and contented expression of countenance, and went to their dinner. Those that came up stairs before me are now nibbling away very hopefully at my door knob, my water pitcher, my wash-bowl, and other things of that kind.

Reno, Nev., June 1, 1881. JOHN R. KELSO.

Our Postal Service.

When the petition was in circulation asking for the repeal of that enactment known as the Comstock law, the writer of this was not among those who affixed their names to that paper, and because of the reason that there existed in my mind some conscientious scruples touching the propriety of such a step.

The discussions and occurrences following the presentment of that petition induced a more careful attention on my part to matters connected with our postal service, however, and, as a result, the conclusions to which I am forced are not calculated to inspire even a decent respect for certain phases of the present regime, nor even toleration of the Comstockish character of certain of its officials.

A few more men of the Comstock type, endowed with power similar to that with which he is invested, and there could scarcely remain a single individual within scope of their jurisdiction who would not, directly or indirectly, be made to feel the weight of some form of persecution, while few—human nature and social conditions being what they are—could hope successfully to resist their devices, decoys, snares, and seductions, or remain uncorrupted by these loathsome wiles.

It seems to me the citizens of our time must be deaf, dumb, blind, idiotic, past all help, not to see and comprehend what a world of mischief such officials are doing; how, by the dishonorable methods practiced, twenty individuals are being corrupted while one is brought to a just judgment.

It is not easy to understand how the late maneuver involving several well-known, legitimate, and useful journals can fail to open the eyes of the public to the danger of longer continuing a system and officials so dangerous to the rights of individuals and the welfare of the people.

If those in authority really do possess one single grain of sincere good motiv, let them turn their attention to the real mischiefs that are extant, leaving honest, respectable individuals alone to pursue unfettered their honorable avocations.

What a ridiculous business is that of the Comstock clique! Suppressing the honest, earnest efforts of noble men and women—who stand head and shoulders above their persecutors in everything—in the endeavor to help the human race to be wiser and better, while the current popular literature of the day is laden with slurs of the coarsest, most abominable kind touching all such subjects as should be treated with dignity and delicacy. Scarcely a daily or weekly journal accustomed to print such as are known as "funny paragraphs" but among half a dozen items will contain one or two, at least, of the most vulgar and indecent slurs upon marriage or the mutual relation of man and woman—slurs than which nothing could be better calculated to prejudice the sexes mutually against each other, or bring into contempt the whole subject of conjugal duty and responsibility, to say nothing of holding in light esteem any such thing as fidelity in the marriage relation. Yet these things go unchallenged, apparently unnoticed, while men and women who sacrifice all that life holds of sunshine and comfort, and consecrate their life-long efforts to the thankless task of opening higher and better pathways for poor human feet to tread, are persecuted, imprisoned, destroyed, because they prefer living earnest, useful lives, doing grand, humane, immortal work, to dawdling their time away in the manufacture of the indecent joke—the double entente, demoralizing pun to grace the columns of what is generally accepted as an approved family paper. I hav a large quantity of clippings of this sort, which would add materially to the official collection, and which, compacted in book form, would undoubtedly complete a suitable code for the immoral school of Comstockists to use as a text-book of ethics for the rising generation.

These things are too glaringly apparent for any to attempt to deny; but this is not all we hav to say on the subject.

The purity of the mails! Laws of Comstockish nature, and their administrators, the purifying agents!

Two or three scientific journals devoted to the best interests of the human family thrown out, and the work is complete. What fallacy! There probably is not a mail made up and sent out from any office of any considerable importance in the Union but contains, and carries to its destination, matter that is undermining the social structure, breaking up the family, wrecking the lives and breaking the hearts of the pure, the true, and the good.

This matter no censor of the mails, whether he be a sincere vindicator of the noble and good methods of living action, or a narrow-minded, brutal persecutor, desiring only personal emolument, etc., can ever suppress, unless by entire discontinuance of the postal service. A large percentage of the private box and lock-drawer post-office accommodation hides about the only real damage to the community that the postal service can be made the instrument of. Many a broken-hearted wife knows full well that these boxes and locked drawers constantly receive into their safe and private recesses those very elegant tinted envelopes bearing the feminin chirography without, corresponding to that within, the contents of which she never sees (except very occasionally, by accident or strategy), the productions of the favored mistress, the unprincipled courtesan, even sometimes the degraded prostitute, the death-blow of wifely hopes and wifely happiness, a source of untold misery to thousands of noble and good women, a wrong for which they hav no redress because secured beyond their reach. On the other hand, no doubt there are many honorable and faithful husbands who go sorrowing to their graves, knowing full well (what they cannot often legally prove) that giddy, inconstant, and unloving wives are often the senders of these same trouble-making missivs, carrying woe, death, and destruction to the homes of the recipients.

The indecent print or picture can be suppressed outside the mails, but the epistolary correspondence that is damaging more than all things connected with the mails the social fabric as at present constructed is the only source of moral contamination that we hav to dread, so far as the mails are concerned.

But this is probably about the last matter that the more officious postal servants will care to turn their attention to. The real cause of social rottenness seems not to be what they are after. It is evidently the remedy they wish to destroy.

But the era of such insane ruling is waning. We hav reason to believe there is intelligence and conscience somewhere, and to unearth the former and quicken the latter let us be up and doing.

JENNIE B. BROWNE.

LET law cease to protect, or rather to uphold Christianity as a favored belief; let it be just as respectable to disbelieve as to believe; let both sides be fairly protected and represented, and then the Christian religion would quietly and gently pass away into a thing of mere history and become one of the dead beliefs of a by-gone race.

Discussion.

Our Twentieth Letter to Mr. Mair.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I will take no exception to your attempted sarcasm as to the logic, etc., of my last letter. I will leave it with our readers to decide whether my remarks were logical or illogical, argumentative or not argumentative. But I will have to demur against your charge of coarseness for bringing to mind certain subjects and narratives contained in the book which you insist was written by divine wisdom and purity. It was of course legitimate for you to quote such parts of it as you deemed calculated to show its exalted character and origin; and as I occupy ground antagonistic to you it was equally legitimate for me to indicate such parts of the volume as in my judgment bear evidence of the opposite of extreme purity and excellence. I think I misrepresented or exaggerated nothing, and it cannot be considered courteous in you to charge me with coarseness for simply alluding to certain parts of a book of which millions of copies have been circulated, and which has been placed in the hands of almost every man, woman, and child in the land. No, the coarseness is in the book itself, and in those who like yourself insist that it shall be accepted as a superhuman production and that it contains purity and morality of an order not within the power of human beings to equal. To combat what seems to me such an utter falsehood, I certainly have the right to indicate such parts as in my view militate against the claim. If the Bible is all purity and morality it is very singular why it should be coarse to call attention to. No, it is because it is coarse and indecent that you are offended at my indicating certain parts of it. This is not the first time you have used the taunt of coarseness, and it would seem quite as well for you to place it where it belongs.

I am at a loss to know what you mean when you hint about my striving to make it appear that you have wasted time, and about my promising brevity. Possibly you have been dreaming something that has never taken place.

I could hardly suppress the smile that irresistibly spread over my face when I read your apology for the indecency of the Bible. Has indeed your holy book of heaven sunk so low that you have to justify it by claiming that it is not much worse than the writings of Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, and Heywood? If it must be admitted that those writers descended a trifle into the domain of the coarse and vulgar does that by any means excuse the God of all purity and holiness for relating with unnecessary minutiæ of detail accounts of incest, rape, adultery, whoring, seduction, stealing, robbery, murder, and wholesale slaughter? Is your God to be compared to Voltaire, Diderot, Rousseau, and Heywood, and is the purity of his writings to be measured by theirs? And is what they chose to indulge in to be considered the hight of propriety and purity in him? I must confess to you it is a somewhat low ideal of what the infinite God of the universe is, to guage him by any French, German, or American writer. If he cannot do better than they do he is certainly a God of very small caliber. Voltaire, Diderot, and Rousseau professed to be nothing but ordinary human beings. They did not for one moment dream that they were gods and were penning holy scriptures which the people must accept as coming directly from heaven. It is, however, very easy for you to disparage the efforts of unbelievers and hold up the imperfections of those who do not accept the truth of Christian dogmas. Truth, however, will compel the confession that Diderot, Voltaire, and Rousseau, though they conformed to the style of the period in which they lived, wrote quite as decently as the Christian Boccaccio, the Christian priest Rabelais, Montaigne, Fielding, Smollet, Swift, and others.

ANCIENT MORAL TEACHERS.

I will now give some additional quotations from the world's ancient teachers, with a view to showing that the heathens taught as good morals, and in as unexceptionable a manner, as are found in the Jewish scriptures, or as those accorded to Jesus. I will be able, of course, to give here but very limited quotations. It should be borne in mind that the heathen scriptures, in the aggregate, are more than twenty times the quantity of the Jewish and Christian scriptures.

Here are a few additional passages from Zoroaster's teachings:

Though a man has been brave in battle, killed wild beasts, and fought with all manner of external evils, if he has neglected to combat evil within himself, he has reason to fear that Ahriman and his devs will seize him and carry him to Dazakh [hell], where he will be punished according to his sins.

Not to satisfy the vengeance of Ormuzd, but because having connected himself with evil, this is the only means of being purified therefrom so as to be capable of enjoying happiness at a future period.

Every man who is pure in thoughts, words, and actions will go to the celestial regions. Every man who is evil in thoughts, words, and actions will go to the place of the wicked.

All good thoughts, words, or actions are the productions of he celestial world.

Avoid everything calculated to injure others. Have no companionship with a man who injures his neighbors.

These are from the Zend Avesta:

I will worship and adore, says Zoroaster, the creator of all things. Ahura Mazda, full of light. I worship the Amesha-epentas. I worship the body of the primal bull—the soul of the bull.

I invoke thee, O Fire, thou son of Ormuzd, most rapid of the Immortals! I invoke Mithra, the lofty, the immortal, the pure, the sun, the ruler, the quick horse, the eye of Ormuzd!

I invoke the holy Sraosha, gifted with holiness, and Racnu (spirit of justice), and Arstal (spirit of truth)! I invoke the Fravashi of good men, the Fravashi of Ormuzd, the Fravashi of my own soul!

I praise the good men and women of the whole world of purity! I praise the Haoma, health-bringing, golden with moist stalks! I praise Sraosha, whom our four horses carry spotless, bright, shining, swifter than the storms, who, without sleeping, protects the world in the darkness!

Blessed is he, blessed are all men to whom the living, wise God of his own command should grant those two everlasting powers (immortality and purity). I believe thee, O God, to be the best thing of all, the source of all light for the world. Every one shall choose thee as a source of light, thee, thee, holiest Mazda!

I ask thee, tell me right, thou living God, who was from the beginning the father of the pure world? Who has made a path for the sun and for the stars? Who (but thou) makes the moon to increase and decrease? This I wish to know, except what I already know.

Who holds the earth and the skies above it? Who made the waters and the trees of the field? Who is in the winds and storms that they so quickly run? Who is the creator of the good-minded beings, thou Wise? Who has made the kindly light and the darkness, the kindly sleep and the awaking? Who has made the mornings, the noons, and the nights, they who remind the hour of his duty?

Bunsen pictures an assembly gathered on one of the holy hills dedicated to the worship of fire in the neighborhood of the primeval city of the marvels, in Central Asia, Bactria, the glorious, now called Balkh. Thus Zoroaster speaks in the Zend Avesta:

Now I shall proclaim to all who have come to listen to the praises of thee, the all-wise Lord, and the hymns of the Good Spirit.

Hear with your ears what is best, perceive with your mind what is pure, so that every man may, for himself, choose his tenets before the great doom. May the wise be on your side.

Those old spirits who are twins made known what is good and what is evil in thoughts, words, and deeds. Those who are good distinguished between the two, not those who are evil doers.

When these two Spirits came together they made first life and death, so there should be at last the most wretched life for the bad, but for the good blessedness.

Of these two Spirits the evil one chose the worst deeds; the kind Spirit, he whose garment is the immovable sky, chose what is right; and they also who faithfully please Ahura Mazda by good works.

Let us, then, be of those who further this world, O Ahura Mazda! O bliss-conferring Asha (truth), let our mind be there where wisdom abides.

Then indeed there will be the fall of the pernicious Druj (falsehood), but in the beautiful abode of Vohumano (the good spirit), of Mazda and Asha, will be gathered forever those who dwell in good report.

O men, if you cling to these commandments which Mazda has given, which are a torment to the wicked and a blessing to the righteous, then there will be a victory through them.

RESEMBLANCE BETWEEN ZOROASTRINISM AND JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

1. A personal, unseen, eternal deity.
2. The creation of the universe from nothing.
3. A first pair, the parents of the human race.
4. A great flood, which submerged the world.
5. A special lawgiver and prophet to make known God's will.
6. God met the lawgiver on the top of a holy mountain amidst thunder and lightning.
7. Sacred books or scriptures.
8. The inculcation of morals and good conduct.
9. A theocracy—a government of the world by God.
10. The service of a mediatorial priesthood.
11. Animal sacrifice.
12. A belief in the efficacy of prayer.
13. Supernaturalism rather than nature's laws.
14. Belief in the son of God as a mediator.
15. Belief in good angels and spirits.
16. Belief in a devil and wicked spirits.
17. Belief in a hell of torture and unhappiness.
18. A perpetual warfare between good and bad spirits.
19. Belief in a future state of existence.
20. Belief in wonderful miracles.
21. Keeping the 25th of December as a great festival in honor of the son of God.
22. A strong opposition to idols and idolatry.
23. Belief in a resurrection of the body.
24. A final day of judgment.
25. Teaching the curbing of the passions and a pure life.
26. The inculcation of love and forgiveness.
27. The final destruction of the world by fire.
28. Disintegration into sects and divisions.

As Zoroastrinism is as old as Judaism, and nearly a thousand years older than Christianity, it will not be difficult to decide whether the latter is the original.

The Chinese scriptures called the Kings are voluminous, but a few quotations must suffice:

What the Great Learning teaches us is to illustrate illustrious virtue; to renovate the people; and to rest in the highest excellence.

The ancients who wished to illustrate illustrious virtue throughout the empire first ordered well their own states; wishing to order well their own states, they first regulated their families; wishing to regulate their families, they first cultivated their persons; wishing to cultivate their persons, they first rectified their hearts; wishing to rectify their hearts, they sought to be sincere in their thoughts; wishing to be sincere in their thoughts, they first extended to the utmost their knowledge. Such investigation of knowledge lay in the investigation of things.

There is a great course, also, for the production of wealth. Let the producers be many and the consumers few. Let there be activity in the production and economy in the expenditure. Then the wealth will always be sufficient.

The following are from the Chung Lung, or the doctrine of man:

What heaven has confirmed is called Nature; an accordance with this nature is called the Path of Duty; the regulation of this path is called instruction.

While there are no stirrings of pleasure, anger, sorrow, or joy the mind may be said to be in a state of equilibrium. When those feelings have been stirred and they act in their due degree, there comes what may be called a state of harmony. This equilibrium is the great root from which grow all the human actions of the world, and this harmony is the universal path which they all should possess.

Let the states of equilibrium and harmony exist in perfection, and a happy order will prevail through our heaven on earth, and all things will be nourished and flourish.

When one cultivates to the utmost the principles of his nature, and exercises them on the principles of reciprocity, he is not far from the path.

The way of heaven and earth is large and substantial, high and brilliant, far-reaching and long-enduring.

The following are from the Shoo-King, which is thought to have been written twenty-five hundred years before our era:

It was the lesson of our ancestors
The people should be cherished;
They should not be down-trodden;
The people are the root of the country;
The root firm, the country is tranquil.
When I look throughout the empire,
Of the simple men and the simple women
Any one may surpass me
If I, the one man, err repeatedly.
Should dissatisfaction be waited for till it appears?
Before it is seen it should be guarded against.
In my relations to the millions of the people
I should feel so much anxiety as if I were driving
Six horses with rotten reins.
The ruler of men, how can he be but reverent of his duty?

One of the rulers of the country is represented as talking in this way:

I have deeply thought and concluded. Let me have but one resolute minister plain and sincere, without other abilities, but having a simple, complacent mind, and possessed of generosity, regarding the talents of others as if he himself possessed them.

And when he finds accomplished and sage-like men, loving them more in his heart than his mouth expresses, really himself able to bear, such a minister would be able to preserve my descendants and my people, and would indeed be a giver of benefits.

The following quotations are from the Che-King:

The Sovereign Lord of heaven produced all the motions of the world, and reigns over them. He makes no exception of persons, but esteems virtue alone, loving men only so far as they worship him sincerely. He hears the prayers of the merciful, but he destroys the wicked. We ought to pray to him for immortal life.

Perfection consists in being united to the Supreme Unity. The soul was at first luminous, but it was afterward obscured. It should be our earnest endeavor to restore it to its primitive light. It is only by destroying all wrong desires and all self-love that we can perceive celestial reason.

What is called reason is properly an attribute of Tien, the Supreme God. The light which he communicates to men is a participation of this reason. What is called reason in Tien is virtue in man, and when reduced to practice is called justice. The truly wise man remains within himself, and piety rules all his conduct.

To think that we have virtue is to have very little of it. Wisdom consists in being very humble, as if we were incapable of anything, yet ardent, as if we could do all.

When thou art in the secret places of thy house, do not say, "No one sees me," for there is an intelligent spirit who seeth all. Tien the Supreme pierces into the recesses of the heart as light penetrates into a dark room. We must endeavor to be in harmony with his light like musical instruments being perfectly attuned. We must receive from his hand as soon as he opens it. He seeks to enlighten us continually, but by our disorderly passions we close the entrance to our souls.

Mankind overwhelmed with afflictions seem to doubt Providence; but when the hour of executing his decrees shall come none can resist him. He will then show that when he punished he was just and good, and that he was never actuated by vengeance and hatred.

Confucius was the great teacher and reformer of the Chinese people. Take him all in all, the world has produced few moral teachers superior to him. He was born 550 years before the time of Jesus, and at the present day he has some 250,000,000 worshipers. He thus speaks of himself:

At fifteen years I longed for wisdom. At thirty my mind was fixed in pursuit of it. At forty I saw clearly certain principles. At fifty I understood the rule given by heaven. At sixty everything I heard I easily understood. At seventy the desire of my heart no longer transgressed the law.

In the morning I hear about the right way, and in the evening I die. I can be happy.

He also says of himself:

He is a man who in his earnestness in seeking knowledge forgets his food, and in his joy for having found it loses all sense of his toil, and thus occupied is unconscious that he has almost reached old age.

Coarse rice for food, water to drink, the bended arm for a pillow—happiness may be enjoyed even with them; but without virtue both riches and honor seem to me like the passing cloud.

The following are among the teachings and maxims of Confucius:

Grieve not that men know you not; grieve that you know men not.

To rule with equity is like the North Star, which is fixed and all the rest go round it.

The essence of knowledge is, having it, to apply it; not having it, to confess your ignorance.

Worship as though the deity were present.

If my mind is not engaged in worship it is as though I worshiped not.

Formerly in hearing men I heard their words and gave them credit for their conduct; now I hear their words and observe their conduct.

A man's life depends on virtue; if a bad man lives it is only by good fortune.

Some proceed blindly to action without knowledge. I hear much and select the best course.

The good man is serene, the bad always in fear. A good man regards the poor; he fixes the root and all else flows out of it. The root is filial piety, the fruit brotherly love.

There may be fair words and a humble countenance where there is little real virtue.

I daily examine myself in a threefold manner: in my transactions with men, if I am upright; in my intercourse with friends, if I am faithful; and whether I illustrate the teachings of my master in my conduct.

Faithfulness and sincerity are the highest qualities.

When you transgress, do not fear to return.

Learn the past and you will know the future.

Not to correct our faults is to commit new ones.

Be rigid to yourself and gentle to others and you will have no enemies.

The wise man loves to be by himself; the fool seeks company.

By the very errors of men we may judge whether they are virtuous or not. If a good man errs, it is generally through excess of affection or gratitude; but the errors of a vicious man commonly proceed from an excess of hatred and ingratitude.

Life and death depend on the law of Tien, which is immutable. Poverty and riches are dispensed by Tien, who cannot be corrupted. A wise man reveres the dispensation of Tien, and thus enjoys inward tranquillity and peace.

He who knows right principles is not equal to those who love them; nor is he who loves them equal to him who delights in them.

To know that a thing is right and not do it is a weakness.

Have not a friend morally inferior to yourself.

Treat all without regard to what class they belong to.

To be thought instructed in music and rites, to teach others principles of virtue, to possess the friendship of many wise men, these are useful satisfactions. But satisfactions derived from pride, vanity, idleness, and sensual pleasure are injurious.

How wise is Hwuy! He has only a bamboo vase for his rice, a cup to drink from, and a mean, narrow lane for his habitation. Other men could not endure such privations; but it disturbs not the serenity of Hwuy.

Fix thy thoughts on duty, practice without ceasing the virtue of humanity, and if you have leisure cultivate the arts.

To keep invariably in the due medium constitutes virtue. Men rarely persevere in it.

The nature of man is upright. If in the course of his life he loses his natural uprightness, he swerves far from all happiness.

If wise and virtuous men were to govern a state for a hundred years they could put an end to tyranny and punishments.

Abroad do your duty to your prince and his magistrates. At home obey your father, mother, and elder brothers. In funeral and sacrificial rites do not permit any negligence. Allow yourself no excess in the use of wine.

I see no defect in the character of Yu. He was sober in eating and drinking, and eminently pious toward spirits and ancestors. His common apparel was coarse, but his sacrificial robes were beautifully adorned. He lived in an humble dwelling, but employed his strength in making ditches and water-courses for the good of the people.

There was an old tradition that the Yu here referred to was born of a virgin, and was begotten by the rays of a star, nearly two thousand years before those scriptures were penned, and was employed by the emperor to drain off the waters of a great deluge which had taken place.

When Confucius was asked what might be said in favor of rewarding hatred by kindness, he replied:

"In that case with what will you reward kindness? Return bad treatment with equity, and remember kindness with kindness."

One of his disciples begged him to teach him how to die well. The philosopher answered:

"You have not yet learned to live well; when you have learned that you will know how to die well."

On one occasion he was inquired of what one maxim expressed the conduct proper for a whole life. The great teacher replied:

"Never do to others what you would not have them do to you."

This is virtually the Golden Rule, for the utterance of which Jesus has been lauded thousands of times. But it was taught by Confucius over five hundred years before Jesus spoke almost the same words.

Among the points of similarity between Confucius and Jesus are the following:

Both were claimed to be of royal descent.

Both were of poor parentage.

Both were actuated by a deep love of the human race.

Both traveled about the country teaching moral lessons.

Both had a band of devoted disciples.

Both enjoined brotherly love.

Both taught the Golden Rule.

Both were despised by the haughty and proud.

Both have been greatly revered since death.

Both by their teachings have greatly influenced the world.

Among the points of dissimilarity are these:

Confucius married; Jesus did not.

Confucius was a father; Jesus was not.

Confucius taught fifty years; Jesus one year.

Confucius taught twenty times as much as Jesus.

Confucius was educated; Jesus probably not.

Confucius taught the practical needs of this life; Jesus taught much about a life after this.

Confucius aimed to make man better here; Jesus hereafter.

Confucius pronounced no curses; Jesus did.

Confucius said little about unknown gods; Jesus said much.

Confucius occupied himself little about devils; Jesus much.

Confucius sent none to hell; Jesus many.

Confucius showed no revenge; Jesus did.

Confucius damned none; Jesus many.

Confucius gave not away to anger; Jesus did.

Confucius did not teach to hate and forsake father and mother; Jesus did.

Confucius did not whip and scourge money-changers; Jesus did.

Confucius ordered no one to steal an ass; Jesus did.

Confucius did not furnish wine to people already sufficiently intoxicated; Jesus did.

Confucius did not pluck others' corn; Jesus did.

Confucius wrote down his own sayings; Jesus did not.

Confucius taught practical lessons; Jesus did not.

Confucius claimed not to be a son of God; Jesus did.

Confucius pretended to work no miracles; Jesus did.

Confucius taught no supernaturalism; Jesus did.

Confucius taught industry and agriculture; Jesus did not.

Confucius recommended a union of the sexes; Jesus did not.

Confucius did not invite persecution against himself; Jesus did.

Confucius taught in plain, simple language which could not be mistaken, and not in metaphor, enigmas, parables, and riddles; Jesus was quite the reverse.

Confucius died a peaceful, natural death; Jesus was executed.

The religion of Confucius has had a peaceful effect; that of Jesus has led to more war and bloodshed than any other in the world.

Which was the best man? which the best religion?

Lao-tse, another grand Chinese teacher, lived 1517 B.C. I will give a specimen of his philosopy:

There is something chaotic in nature which existed before heaven and earth. It was still. It was void. It stood alone and was not changed. It pervaded everywhere and was not endangered. It may be regarded as the mother of the universe. I know not its name, but give it the title of Tau. If I am forced to give a name for it, I say it is Great; being great, I say it passes away; passing away, I say it is far off; being far off, I say it returns.

Now Tau is great; earth is great; a king is great. In the universe there are four greatnesses, and a king is one of them. Man takes his law from the earth; the earth takes its law from heaven; heaven takes its law from Tau, and Tau takes it from what it is in itself.

Mencius was another distinguished Chinese teacher and philosopher, about 400 B. C. His writings made four large volumes. These are samples of his maxims:

I love life; I also love righteousness. If I cannot keep both I will let life go and choose righteousness.

There is a nobility of heaven, and there is a nobility of man. Benevolence, righteousness, and self-consecration and fidelity, and with unwearied joys in these virtues—these constitute the nobility of heaven.

Benevolence subdues its opposite, just as water subdues fire. Those, however, who practice benevolence nowadays do it as if with one cup of water they could save a whole wagon load full of fuel on fire, and when the flames are not extinguished should say that water cannot subdue fire. This conduct, moreover, greatly encourages those who are not benevolent.

There is no greater delight than to be conscious of sincerity on self-examination.

Upon a friend saying to Mencius that his principles were admirable, but were too difficult and lofty for ordinary minds and requested him to adapt his teachings to the comprehension of his learners, he replied, "A great artificer does not, for the sake of a stupid workman, alter and do away with the marking-line.

The Golden Rule of Mencius is as follows:

If a man love others, and no responsive attachment is shown him, let him turn inward and examine his own benevolence. If he is trying to rule others, and his government is unsuccessful, let him turn inward and examine his wisdom. If he treats others politely, and they do not return his politeness, let him turn inward and examine his own feelings of respect.

When we do not by what we do realize, what we desire, we must turn inward and examine ourselves in every point. When a man's person is correct the whole empire will turn to him with recognition and submission.

Be always studious, and be in harmony with the ordinances of God, and you will obtain much happiness. With what measure a man metes it will be measured to him again, and consequently before a man deals with others, expecting them to be affected by him, he should first deal with himself.

The superior man is distinguished from other men by what he possesses in his heart; namely, benevolence and propriety. The benevolent man loves others. The man of propriety shows respect to others.

He who loves others is constantly loved by them. He who respects others is constantly respected by them.

I will take space for but a few quotations from the Egyptian sacred writings, a large portion of which in the lapse of ages have been destroyed. Perhaps their rituals are as worthy of notice as anything. The following is a form of confession or self-examination:

I have not afflicted any. I have not told falsehoods. I have not made the laboring man do more than his task. I have not been idle. I have not murdered. I have not committed fraud. I have not injured the images of the gods. I have not taken scraps of bandages off the dead. I have not committed adultery. I have not cheated by false weights. I have not kept milk from sucklings. I have not caught the sacred birds. I have not boasted. I have not stolen. I have not counterfeited. I have not killed sacred beasts, nor blasphemed, nor refused to heart the truth, nor despised God in my heart.

The inscriptions on the tombstones of that country are characteristic and show the morals of the people. Here are specimens:

He loved his father, he honored his mother, he loved his brethren, and never went from his home in bad temper. He never preferred the great to the law.

I was a wise man; my soul loved God. I was a brother to the great men and a father to the humble ones, and never was a mischief maker.

I honored my father, I esteemed my mother, I loved my brothers. I found graves for the dead. I instructed little children. I took care of orphans as though they were my own children. For great misfortunes were in Egypt in my time and on this city of Sais.

What I have done I will say. My goodness and my kindness were ample. I never oppressed the fatherless nor the widow. I did not treat cruelly the fishermen, the shepherds, nor the poor laborers. There was nowhere in my time hunger and want. For I have cultivated all my fields, far and near, in order that their inhabitants might have food. I never preferred the great and powerful to the humble and poor, but did equal justice to all.

I lived in truth and fed my soul with justice. What I did to men was done in peace, and how I loved God, God and my heart well knew. I have given bread to the hungry, water to the thirsty, clothes to the naked, and a shelter to the stranger I honored the gods with sacrifices, and the dead with offerings.

The following are some of the stanzas in which the God Amun addresses Thothmes:

I am come; to thee have I given to strike down Syrian princes;
Under thy feet they lie throughout the breadth of their country;
Like to the Lord of Light, I make them see thy glory,
Blinding their eyes with light, O earthly image of Amun!

I am come; to thee have I given to strike down Asian peoples;
Captive now hast thou led the proud Assyrian chieftains;
Decked in royal robes, I made them see thy glory,
In glittering arms and fighting, high in thy lofty chariot.

I am come; to thee have I given to strike down the western nations;
Cyprus and the Ases have both heard thy name with terror;
Like a strong-horned bull I made them see thy glory,
Strong with piercing horns, so that none can stand before him.

I am come; to thee have I given to strike down Lybian archers;
All the isles of the Greeks submit to the force of thy spirit;
Like a regal lion I made them see thy glory,
Couched by the corpse he has made down in the rocky valley.

I am come; to thee have I given to strike down the ends of the ocean;
In the grasp of thy hand is the circling zone of the waters;
Like the soaring eagle have I made them see thy glory,
Whose far-seeing eye there is none can hope to escape from.

Sometimes the god Amun seemed slow to act, and had to be appealed to in very forcible language. The following is an address of Ramses II. when on a campaign in Syria, when about to be overpowered and taken by the enemy. The same is inscribed on the walls of Karnak:

Have I not ecected to thee great temples? Have I not sacrificed to thee thirty thousand oxen? I have brought from Elephantina obelisks to set up to thy name. I invoke thee, O Father Amun! I am in the midst of unknown tribes, and alone; but Amun is better to me than thousands of archers and millions of horsemen! Amun will prevail over the enemy.

After defeating his foes, the king sang thus in triumph:

Amun-Ra has been at my right hand and my left in the battles. His mind has inspired my own, and has repeated the downfall of my enemies. Amun-Ra, my father has brought the whole world to my feet!

What Judaism borrowed from Egypt:

1. Circumcision. This rite was practiced long before the Jews.
2. A hereditary priesthood with divine rights.
3. The phrase, "I am that I am."
4. White linen robes of the priests.
5. The sacred ark carried on poles.
6. Style and fashion of temple for worship.
7. The rich temple and holy of holies.
8. The cherubim with extended wings.
9. Urim and Thummim as symbolical jewels.
10. Branched candlesticks.
11. Animal sacrifice to deity.
12. The rite of sending away the sins of the people on a scapegoat.
13. The rule of the priesthood—a veritable theocracy.
14. Prayer and humiliation to affect a deity.
15. The monotheistic idea.
16. Prophecy.
17. The belief in the rites of purification.
18. Belief in the necessity of a holy life.
19. Kings subservient to priests.
20. Use of musical instruments in worship.

What Christianity borrowed from Egypt:

1. Belief in a begotten son of God.
2. Belief in and worship of the virgin and child.
3. Belief that a god could die.

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

MARTHA AND MARY, THE SISTERS OF LAZARUS.

"Now it came to pass, as they went, that he [Jesus] entered into a certain village; and a certain woman, named Martha, received him into her house. And she had a sister called Mary, which also sat at Jesus's feet, and heard his word. But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to him, and said, Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? bid her therefore that she help me. And Jesus answered, and said unto her, Martha, Martha, thou art careful, and troubled about many things; but one thing is needful; and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken from her" (Luke x, 38–44).

Probably no account in the Bible of equal length has furnished the clergy with a more fruitful source of theological rant than the above text. The contrast between these sisters has been boastingly cited to prove the vast superiority of Mary over Martha, and the preëminence of Christian virtues over a worldly and complaining spirit. Indolent, selfish Mary has always been lauded to the skies as a pattern of divine perfection, while faithful, toiling Martha has been held in contempt as a fretful termagant and an unceasing fault-finder. Mary, a lovely saint; Martha, a cold, calculating worldling! Mary, a spiritual devotee, giving up all for Jesus; Martha, a material woman, engrossed in household cares! Mary sitting at Jesus's feet and learning wisdom from his teachings; Martha sweeping the kitchen floor and getting dinner! Mary loving Jesus's presence and person; Martha providing for his wants and ministering to his comfort! Mary doing nothing; Martha at work! Behold the contrast! What a picture for divines to contemplate and descant upon! "Mary hath chosen that good part" (Jesus), while Martha is but a housekeeper, a servant. In proof of this let us examine the statements of some of the reverends.

Rev. David Brown, D.D., in the Critical Commentary, says, "The house belonged to her (Martha) and she appears throughout to be the elder sister. . . She presented herself before him, 'cumbered,' distracted, as from another apartment in which her sister had left her to serve or make preparations alone, saying, 'Lord, here am I, with everything to do, and this sister of mine will not lay a hand to anything; and thus I miss something from thy lips and thou from our hands.'"

Thus he goes on deploring and condemning "the outward bustle of those too elaborate preparations, which so engrossed her attention that she missed her Lord's teachings." As seen by the text, Jesus, instead of commiserating Martha's helpless condition, turns upon her with a reproof which must have sent her back into the kitchen or laundry with a heavier heart than before. Smith says, "She needed the reproof because she lost the calmness of her spirit," but condescends to add, "Her love, though imperfect in its form, is yet recognized as true."

No wonder that "careful" Martha was "troubled." A guest had unexpectedly arrived—Jesus! She, as "the elder sister, head, and manager of the household," felt her great responsibility, realizing that without the aid of the younger she could not properly meet the emergency, and so "probably" (as the divines interpolate) called upon Mary for assistance. But Mary had not only rushed into the parlor at first to greet Jesus, but remained there tete-a-tete, though well aware of the dilemma in which her sister was placed; for we will "conjecture," as do the commentators, that it was wash-day and there was nothing cooked in the house, the girls intending to have a picked-up dinner. But now everything was reversed, and Martha was in an "outward bustle," to be sure, which was hightened by Mary taking no part or interest in the matter. She, too, "probably," would gladly have sat at Jesus's feet, or by his side, or in his lap, or leaned on his bosom; but the house was all in confusion, they must have something to eat, and somebody must get it; and so poor, fatigued, disappointed Martha set herself about it as best she could. First she must clear away the washing and put the kitchen into something of a decent appearance, as Jesus might have occasion to pass through that apartment. Then the dining-room was all out of order, the best company table-cloth had been washed, and though now dried was unironed. This Mary could do while she was engaged in other duties. But Martha had no helping hand. The table must be laid, the food prepared; and if Mary would but come and attend to some of these lesser things, like roasting and grinding the coffee, slicing the bread, paring the potatoes and onions, getting out and opening the preserve cans, arranging the apartments, and subsequently taking the ewer of water to the lodging-room of Jesus, making his bed, and regulating there, she could get through expeditiously and comfortably, and have time to sit down after dinner, gratified and refreshed, to enjoy herself with her sister and the son of God. But no, the fire would not burn, the rooms would not right themselves, dinner would not put itself upon the table; Jesus would work no miracle for her relief.

As all this and much more rushed through the brain of this bewildered woman, as in perspiration and tears she saw a dozen things to be done all at once and no one to help her, and heard the voices of Jesus and Mary chatting and cooing lovingly in the parlor, is it surprising that her equanimity forsook her and that she went to the Lord with her trouble, saying, "Dost thou not care that my sister has left me to serve alone," thinking in her necessity that this appeal would move him if not her, and still hoping that a command from Jesus when she requested him to "Bid her therefore that she help me" would bring her recreant sister to a sense of duty? But no; Jesus and Mary just then were having too good a time to be interrupted, and so Jesus gave the rebuke, "'Martha, Martha,' emphatically redoubling upon the name," says Brown, the umpire, reproachfully continuing, "Thou art careful and troubled about many things; but one thing is needful; and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her." Was not that "good part" himself? And was it not himself "which shall not be taken away from her" instead of his gospel? Was he not the "one thing needful" to Mary instead of any word he was uttering except his love? Is he not represented as a lovely, blond Anglo-Saxon youth, with auburn hair parted in the middle, floating in beautiful wavelets from a fair forehead down over his neck and shoulders, with a remarkably benignant seraphic countenance, and a noble, commanding figure and manners, "just too sweet for anything?" Methinks I have a faint recollection of having seen such pictures of this young Galilean Jew aforetime! Was not, then, this youthful God sufficiently charming to captivate these impressible Judean damsel sisters? Besides, it is said, Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus (John xi, 5). May we not conjecture there possibly may have been some rivalry between these girl-sisters, as in the case of their illustrious granddame-sisters, Leah and Rachel, in their jealousy for the good old patriarch Jacob, alias Israel? On this occasion a marked preference was manifested for Mary, and Jesus's rebuke was not lacking in its sting to Martha's prudent carefulness and anxiety, even were her affections not enlisted personally in favor of the young Jew God.

In my sympathy for Martha I have been ill-mannered enough to feel sometimes that she would have "served" Jesus and Mary justly had she prepared her own dinner after being rebuffed, partaken of it alone, as did Mary of Jesus's celestial food (the bread which cometh down from heaven, the manna), cleared away the table, washed the dishes, fed the chickens, put everything in apple-pie order, changed her dress and tidied herself up neatly, and then sat down to her crotcheting or to the last new novel or to the piano practicing the latest song as coolly and as unconcernedly as had been this precious pair an hour or two previous, when she had so reasonably and urgently appealed to them for assistance, which in its effect was as necessary and beneficial to their well being as her own; and that when these spiritually-minded lovers became hungry enough for temporal food and grew impatient at not being called to the rich repast which they expected was in store for them and come to inquire the cause of the delay and expressed their astonishment, she would have been justified had she replied with infinite sang-froid: "I have prepared my own dinner and eaten it, and you can do the same for yourselves. If 'but one thing is needful,' and Mary hath chosen that one thing, wherefore needs she a dinner or aught else? If that good part cannot be taken away from her, and that is yourself (Jesus), then you and she are prepared to furnish your own bed and board without the intervention of 'careful, troubled' Martha."

A few such practical lessons would not only have brought Jesus and Mary to their senses, but if practiced now toward the canting, professedly spiritual Christians who set celestial things above temporal, pretending to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, it would tend to make them realize that bread and butter, meat and potatoes, fuel and raiment, were of more value than prayers, creeds, churches, Bibles, Christs, and gods!

It has been maintained by some that Mary was the affianced of Jesus, or even his wife, and that he was the father of a family (as it is recorded in Isa. liii, 8, and Acts viii, 3), who shall declare his generation, for his life is taken from the earth; but none of these views are extensively supported by Bible scholars.

The lesson divines draw from this narrative and urge upon us poor, miserable sinners is that mankind must forsake all for Christ, as did Mary. But if there had been no Martha, pray how could Jesus and Mary have had a dinner? If all were Marys now, and no Marthas, who would cook the turkeys at home on ministerial convention occasions and on Sundays and get up church fairs, and provide the collation for the benefit of the Lord's Zion? In view of this necessity, Brown soothingly concedes that "a church full of Marys would perhaps be as great an evil as a church full of Marthas," and that, too, after having unduly praised the former, and unsparingly condemned the latter. In consideration of these theological difficulties, the ungodly woman has arrived at the conclusion that these watchmen on the walls of Zion find Jordan a pretty hard road to travel.

John xi introduces to us the famous "miracle of Christ raising Lazarus, four days buried," at Bethany. The reader is earnestly requested to peruse the entire chapter, that this review of Martha and Mary may be the better understood. It will be perceived that Mary was still true to her marked characteristics of laziness and selfish grief, "sitting still in the house," while Martha, active and useful as ever, "as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming, went and met him," and, strong in the faith, exclaimed, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died." The remainder of their conversation is very interesting, but must be omitted, with other important matter, for lack of space. Suffice it to say that Martha already believed in a "resurrection at the last day," whenever that might be, and that her brother would then rise, but Jesus convinced her that whoever believed in him should never die, and that he was the Christ, the son of God. So she returned into the house to Mary, secretly saying, "The master is come and calleth for thee." Jesus had not yet come unto the town, but remained where Martha met him, but Mary rose up so hastily (the revisers say quickly) to see him that the bystanders thought she was going to the grave. When she reached Jesus she fell weeping at his feet, repeating the words of Martha, "Lord, hadst thou been here my brother had not died." Jesus wept also and groaned as they proceeded to the cave where Lazarus was buried, and when he said, "Take ye away the stone," Martha, appalled at such a command, for it was forbidden to open a grave after the stone was placed upon it for fear of legal uncleanness by contact with the dead, no one coming nearer a grove than four cubits (Maimonides in Lampe), she, therefore, in astonishment replied, "Lord, by this time he stinketh!" If he was not dead decomposition would not have commenced, and he would not have stunk, but if he was dead the whole sixteen Jesus-Saviors of old could not have raised him, neither could all the pagan gods in the universe, Jehovah included, have brought him to life. So much for that. Martha wisely thought that, according to the laws of nature, if dead, and she supposed he was, he would stink in four days' time, but that does not prove that he did stink. Often have I heard distinguished preachers, when dilating on this monstrous fraud, assert that Lazarus was raised after putrefaction began, and urge this fact in proof that the miracle-worker must therefore be the son of God, yea, God himself, else he could not reorganize and resuscitate the already-decaying carcass. Pshaw! how much evidence would it require for Christians to believe now that a Mormon elder or a Spiritualistic materializer had raised a Lazarus from the dead under like circumstances? If they saw it with their own eyes they would not believe that the miracle-worker was the son of God or God himself! No, they would cry out "humbug!" and search out the modus operandi of the trick, as they would very wisely term it. What a contrast between a belief in past and present miracles.

The most reprehensible part of this whole transaction is Jesus purposely remaining away two days after being informed of the illness of Lazarus, styled "he whom thou lovest," and saying to his disciples, "I am glad for your sakes I was not there, to the intent that ye may believe," in order to give Lazarus time to die, that the son of God might be glorified thereby (verses 15 and 4), in his raising him from the dead, declaring also that his sickness was for the glory of God, and ultimately he neither restored him because he desired the life of Lazurus, or to comfort the sisters, but that "thou shouldst see the glory of God" (verse 40). What a glory was that! How cruel to keep those sisters, whom he loved, in suspense and agony four days, and force Lazarus to go through the pangs of death and the horrors of the tomb that he might glorify himself! How unkind, how selfish! Was there no other method or event through which his godship could be as forcibly and publicly asserted and proclaimed! Then, after all, how few believed! Besides, he endangered the life of Lazarus as well as his own; for the chief priests and Pharisees almost immediately sought to put them both to death as impostors and disturbers of the peace.

Of course Martha and Mary were delighted with the restoration of their brother, but the divines are in a peck of trouble about Lazarus because he is never mentioned before or afterward, except at the anointing supper (John xii); and it appears that he is only there introduced to magnify the power of the son of God and prove his own divinity. It is much more likely that the whole story is a hoax than that such an omission should happen, provided the event ever occurred. The very excuses and apologies made by the faithful are in themselves sufficient to raise a query, even in the mind of a non-skeptic, as to the judiciousness of such an astounding, before unheard-of, miracle being related by but one of the four biographers of Jesus, when such importance was attached to it as an indisputable proof of the divinity of Jesus Christ, and his equality with the father before the world was.

But let that pass. Lazarus seems to be of no account except as a lay figure on which to hang the most stunning miracle recorded in the New Testament, not even excepting the immaculate conception itself.

But let that pass, also. The sisters, particularly Martha, are preëminent over him, and the various conjectures of the various non-inspired ones are so interesting and amusing that we must beg space to copy a few of these wild opinions.

In view of the fact that none of the Evangelists but John relate this astounding miracle, and that it is nowhere else alluded to in the whole Bible, Smith, in his Dictionary, says: "The question why the first three gospels omit all mention of so wonderful a fact (?) as the resurrection of Lazarus has from a comparatively early period forced itself upon interpreters and apologists. The explanations given of the perplexing phenomena are briefly these: That fear of drawing down persecution on one already singled out for it kept the three evangelists, writing during the lifetime of Lazarus, from all mention of him; and that this reason for silence being removed by his death, St. John could write freely. . . . . Matthew and Mark omit equally all mention of the three names (Martha, Mary, and Lazarus). John, writing long afterwards, when all three had 'fallen asleep,' feels that the restraint is no longer necessary."

This explanation is extremely refreshing when we remember that the authorship and character of the fourth gospel has been questioned and criticised by the ablest scholars until there is scarcely a doubt left but what it is spurious. Prof. Newman says, "We have seen that, while there is not one particle of evidence during a century and a half after the events recorded in the fourth gospel that it was composed by the son of Zebedee (John), there is on the contrary the strongest reason for believing that he did not write it," and gives the reasons. This gospel was criticised so severely by Bretschneider as late as 1820 that it has never recovered from it.

In regard to the silence of the history of this family and the paucity of the facts and proofs of the death and resurrection of Lazarus, the same author consoles himself with, "We are able, however, without doing violence to the principles of a true historical criticism, to arrive at some conclusions helping us, with at least some measure of probability, to fill up these scanty outlines. . . . From the order of the three names we may reasonably infer that Lazarus was the youngest of the family." Is not this interesting, definite, and satisfactory? Alas, alas for proof! Brown and other D.D.'s equally fail in their attempted "explanations of the perplexing phenomena," though their suggestions, conjectures, probabilities, possibilities, inferences, and harmonies are as numerous and diversified as the leaves of the forests or the pebbles on the sea-shore.

But we must hasten, as we are not treating of Jesus or miracles, but of these godly sisters in connection with this sacred, historical, divine humbug.

Hawkeye Happenings.

On my missionary tour I stopped first, after leaving Cedar Rapids, at Lisbon. The general conference of the United Brethren church was to be held there in a few weeks, and the air was filled with notes of preparation. Bishops and delegates were being assigned to the hospitalities of the citizens, regardless of the religious or non-religious views of the latte r, with a coolness that was most delightfully refreshing. The bread and beefsteak of the Infidel were evidently just as tempting as the similar viands of the saints of God.

Our ever-activ friend, Joseph Levy, was keenly alive to the vital questions of the hour, and just as ready to sacrifice self in the interests of the good cause. W. Spurrier is a veteran Infidel, hospitable and scholarly. I made the acquaintance of H. Sailor, and found him a true Liberal. I stopped at Mechanicsville for a few hours, having a very pleasant chat with Dr. J. C. Badtorf, though we disagreed radically concerning the proposed prohibitory amendment to the state Constitution. The worthy doctor is earnest, sincere, and a thorough humanitarian; but I think that he will yet liv to see that prohibitory laws cannot do the work which can only be accomplished by time, education, and improved material conditions.

I reached Wheatland on Saturday night, and stayed over Sunday with my friend Jerome Dutton and his kind and generous family. Mrs. Flora Dutton was visiting there, and I can assure you, friend Bennett, that we all paid our respects to Comstock & Co. Could Tyner and the time-servers hav heard some of our remarks their ears would hav tingled. The right of any lawmaker to prescribe what the people shall buy or read was denied with an emphasis which could not be mistaken, and which may be taken as an indication of the spirit which animates the true Liberals of Iowa. I met my friend H. L. Barter. He is loyal to truth and liberty, and "no surrender" is his motto.

On Monday Grand Mound was reached, and "Dutton Hill" once more cheered the wanderer with warm welcome of cordial handclasp and words of hearty greeting. I always feel at home here where everything speaks of progressiv thought. The pictures and mottoes upon the walls, the books and papers upon the tables and shelves, and the photographs in the albums, all speak for the intelligence and independence of Flora and Leroy Dutton. Charles and Lorenzo D. Dutton liv in the same neighborhood, and are equally devoted with their brothers Jerome and Leroy to the cause of mental, industrial, and financial emancipation. No one-idead Liberals, these!

From Grand Mound we went to DeWitt. Here we found E. Sweeting and his cultured daughters, B. F. Gove, Mrs. Butterfield, I. L. Wilcox, and others, earnest and alive to the necessity for constructiv work.

Thence to Jackson county, where we put in four weeks of hard work, visiting Maquoketa, Fulton, Nashville, Baldwin, Preston, Sprague ville, Miles, Sterling, Sabula, Bellevue, La Motte, Andrew, Cottonville, and the surrounding country. For two weeks I traveled in the northern part of the county and did not find a single subscriber to either THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, League Man, Physiologist, Health Monthly, or Health Journal.

Where our papers are not taken the people are in the darkness of Egypt so far as regards the doings of Comstock and the progress of organized Liberalism. But I scattered a considerable amount of secular and Freethought literature through this section, and a few subscribers secured there will leaven the whole lump of apathy in time. In Maquoketa Jacob Glaser, Thomas and Rachel Rosecrans, W. H. McCarran, W. Bradway, Mr. and Mrs. Abbey, S. O. Webster, and H. Stevenson; at Fulton, W. P. Ward; at Nashville, Calvin Teeple; at Baldwin, J. B. Kinsey, Benj. and Charles Tozer, Richard Teeple, Hiram Burnap, and J. E. Williams are not ashamed to be known as Infidels.

At Preston John Durant takes all the Liberal journals, and hence is posted as to what is going on in the world of advanced thought. Himself and wife fear not to let their light shine into all the dark corners of superstition. C. Farley, H. U. Hicks, and Levi Holwayd are also disbelievers in the myths of the dark ages past. At Sprague ville I made the acquaintance of A. Alexander and Mr. Levan. They own their own minds. Mr. Alexander scatters missionary documents far and wide, and will make a splendid worker in the new League movement in Jackson county. Messrs. Hiberling, Miles, and Allen at Miles are Freethinkers.

Protestantism is at a low ebb in Jackson county. The battle is between Catholicism and Liberalism. Several of our best workers in northern Jackson are converts from the Catholic church. Nowhere hav I seen such inroads being made into the strength of Catholicism as in Bellevue and vicinity. The work of disintegration has begun. Where will it stop? Be encouraged, comrades; work on faithful to the end. The day dawneth. Work, work.

Capt. E. E. Potter, father of our friend L. B. Potter, was the pioneer Liberal of Jackson county. To him are we indebted for most of the Freethought now rampant in that section. An Atheist from his very childhood, he came to Iowa many years ago and sowed the good seed far and wide. The library which he collected, now owned by his son Byron, is probably the largest collection of Freethought books in the state. The present owner is constantly adding thereto and loaning to all who will read. Six years ago Capt. Potter passed to the everlasting rest at the ripe age of eighty years. His funeral was unostentatious and simple, as was his express desire, and was conducted by his life-long friend, Hon. John Stuart. Under the shade of the rocky bluffs of "Paradise," beneath the beautiful greensward of a sloping foothill lie the remains of Ellridge E. Potter, immortal in seeds of progress wide sown by the hand of an honest man. Mr. L. B. Potter has set aside this spot of ground where lie the ashes of his father as an Infidel cemetery. No words of superstition, solemnly intoned, will ever profane the sweet solitude of this abiding-place of the dead.

Saturday evening, May 28th, the Liberal League of Jackson county was organized, with A. L. Potter, President; W. G. Stuart, Secretary; P. Praudy, Treasurer; John Durant, N. E. Griffin, Mrs. A. L. Potter, and L. B. Potter, Councilors.

This organization has before it a splendid future if the elements of growth at its disposal are wisely utilized. What we need most of all is constructiv work in the social and educativ line. Our friends here keenly realize this, and we may confidently look for substantial progress in Jackson.

In La Motte and vicinity the working spirit is strong among our friends. Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Griffin, Misses Vie and Metta Dalton are all thoroughly imbued with the desire to help roll onward the car of progress. Bellevue and vicinage boasts of such true Liberals as L. B. Blush, W. A. Weber, P. H. Baunich, Frank Lebau, Misses Weinscheuk, Hyler, Dorchester, Roche, Pitts, Marsden, Bramschreiz, and Bowan.

Friends Marr, Smith, and Scarborough at Sterling; the Butterworths, Hensinger and lady, W. H. Palmer, J. B. Dean, and J C. Blessing at Andrew, all enroll themselvs in the army of Liberalism. From this partial enumeration it will be seen that Jackson county has the material with which to build up a strong and influential secular organization.

Now as to the state organization. The following new members hav been received since my last report in THE TRUTH SEEKER: Annual members, Jerome Dutton, Wheatland; Mrs. C. P. Dutton, Wheatland; L. D. Dutton, DeWitt; B. F. Gove, DeWitt; A. Alexander, Sprague ville; Abner Kimball, Wyoming; Mrs. E. Brown, Bismarck.

Who comes next? Join the League. Annual membership, 50 cents; life, $5.00. Send contributions to the printing fund. On with the dance. Address me at Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Critics Criticised.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I know not whether your worthy contributor, W. H. Burr, the valiant champion of Mr. Paine's literary and patriotic greatness, intended this frightful literary upheaval or not, but certain it seems that the spirit of the late old departed Carlyle of England has again returned to earth and personified himself at "Highland Park, Conn.!" Now see what our friend Burr has done! This old Carlyle—this hater of shams—this wormwood philosopher, which all sensible men piously thought had subsided into thin air, has been resurrected, and is now bent on the destruction of Thomas Jefferson's literary reputation, also on exposing the stupidity of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and in destroying all confidence in Lindly Murray, Milton, Addison, or Dr. Samuel Johnson!

We are all well aware that personally you are a long-suffering, good-natured man, but why try the hazardous experiment of endurance on your many subscribers by admitting this interminable Carlyle communication from some medium from "Highland Park, Conn.?" THE TRUTH SEEKER'S readers, as a body, are a grave, reflectiv class, and your columns are supposed to be sacred to common-sense, and its space is too valuable for inflated spiritual contributions.

It is evident this sacrilegious Carlyle is not a lover of humanity, or possessing the propensity he supposes he does, he should hav taken friend Burr privately aside and told him with due solemnity the important discovery he had made in the grammatical misconstruction of the wording of the Declaration of Independence, and not attempt ruthlessly to agonize the public mind of this vast republic—yea, the thinking minds of both hemispheres—at one fell blow. Although over fourscore years, I trust I will survive the shock.

DAVID BRUCE.

Is Christianity Part and Parcel of the Common Law of the Land?

There is scarcely any one connected with the legal profession, from the veriest pettifoger to the chief justice on the bench, but will enunciate this barefaced falsehood, and who will do his best to cause the base folly to be practised, and yet no two can hardly be found who will agree as to the proper understanding in what Christianity consists, and therefore how to enforce its ruling, it must be conceded, is attended with difficulty. If a learned priest of the mother church undertakes to define the term Christianity, he will readily answer by referring to the rites and ceremonies of the holy Catholic religion; and as that body is in the possession of the truth regarding the matter, and moreover is so pure as to be infallible, that if guided by those inspired teachers we speedily become aware of the quality and consequence of the sublime truth of its consistence, and history is not barren in information as to how human liberty is advanced thereby. Can it be that a thing so commonly infamous is the "common law of the land?" The Presbyterian possessor of inspired knowledge, one who has been benefited by the having had holy hands laid on his "bowing like bulrush" humble head, will not hesitate to rise in his pious wrath at such impudent presumption of the the antichrist of Rome, as for the moment losing his lamb-like patience when attending to the statement of the papist expounders. So he will denounce him and earnestly deny the truth of his statement, pronouncing it unmitigatingly false, and will forthwith undertake to enlighten your ignorance and tell you in what Christianity exists, referring to the holy scriptures, and the creed that he says has been obtained from that manifestation of truth, being nothing less than God's word, and will enter into an elaborate argument to prove the same. But as you properly desire brevity I shall not infringe on your rule, trusting to a future opportunity. Let it suffice now to call attention to this holy conflict and to intimate that the pious difficulty invades all of the holy families of Christendom as to the understanding of it, and that therefore this is often all legal fiction, little less in its imposition than all religion.

4. The doctrine of the atonement.
5. The doctrine of the trinity.
6. Belief in the divine government of the world.
7. Belief in the necessity of a divine sacrifice.
8. Belief in a being half god and half man.
9. The cross as a religious symbol.
10. The doctrine of a future life.
11. The doctrine of judgment after death.
12. Belief in an evil being antagonistic to god.
13. Angels and demons as supernatural beings.
14. Belief in a local heaven and hell.
15. The resurrection of the body.
16. The Christmas festival.
17. The candlemas festival.
18. A keeper of the keys of heaven.
19. The practice of holy pilgrimages.
20. The presentation of the wedding ring.
21. Shaving the heads of priests.
22. Linen surplices worn by priests.
23. The use of a liturgy in worship.
24. The doctrine of aceticism and self-denial.
25. The priesthood claiming divine knowledge.

Several of these points of belief were held by a few of the ancient nations. That they are not original with Christianity nothing in the world is more sure.

In a previous letter I gave you a few quotations from the teachings of Buddha; but his teachings are so voluminous and so unexceptionable in point of morality that I fear I have not done him full justice. Let me give a few more of his moral rules and maxims:

Let us live happily, then, not hating those who hate us; let us dwell free from hatred among men who hate.

Let us live happily, free from greed among the greedy.

Let us live happily though we call nothing our own. We shall be like the bright gods feeding on happiness.

He who has given up both victory and defeat, he, the contented, is happy.

Buddha proclaimed his law of love in these words:

My law is a law of mercy for all. Proclaim it freely to all men. It shall cleanse good and evil, rich and poor alike; it is as large as the space of heaven and excludes none.

Let a man overcome anger with love; let him overcome evil with good; let him overcome the greedy by liberality, the liar by the truth.

From the Dhammapada:

Forsake all evil, bring forth good, master thy own thoughts; such is Buddha's path to the end of all pain.

Overcome evil with good, the avaricious with generosity, the false with truth.

One day of endeavor is better than a hundred of years of sloth.

Watch thyself with all diligence, and hold thyself in as the spirited steed is held in by its owner.

Master thyself, so mayest thou teach others and easily tame them after having tamed thyself; for self is hardest to tame.

Think not lightly of evil; drop by drop the jar is filled; think not lightly of good; the wise are filled with purity, gathering it drop by drop.

The true sage dwells on earth as the bee that gathers sweetness with his mouth and wings without harming the color and perfume of the flowers.

The swans [wild fowls] go on the path of the sun; they go through the ether by their miraculous power [instinct]. So are the wise led out of this world where they have conquered the tempter of his brain.

The heart of love and faith accompanying good actions spreads a beneficent shade through all the world.

RESEMBLANCE BETWEEN BUDDHA AND JESUS.

1. Both are claimed to have a virgin mother.
2. Both are reputed of royal blood.
3. Both lived a life of self-denial.
4. Both had a band of disciples.
5. Both taught orally, and their teachings were written out by others.
6. Both are claimed to perform miracles.
7. Much that is mythical pertains to both.
8. The doctrines of both spread rapidly.
9. Both systems have been embraced by large numbers (Buddha's much the largest).
10. Both are claimed to have improved the morals of those who embraced them.
11. Both practiced self-abnegation.
12. Both lived a life of celibacy.
13. Both taught non-resistance.
14. Both systems have monasteries.
15. Both have nuns and nunneries.
16. Both have images of virgin and child.
17. Both use the symbol of the cross.
18. Both have confession of sins.
19. In both the miter is used in priestly toggery.
20. Both have the dalmatica and cape.
21. Both use the psalmody and double choirs.
22. Both believe in devils and evil spirits.
23. Both believe in casting out devils.
24. Both illustrate their doctrines with sermons.
25. Both use the censer with five chains.
26. Both use benedictions.
27. Both use chaplets in religious ceremonies.
28. Both use prayer and enjoin it.
29. Both practice the worship of saints.
30. Both have images to represent saints.
31. Both enjoin fasting to effect heaven.
32. Both believe in religious processions.
33. Both use litanies in worship.
33. Both believe in holy water.
34. Both have the doctrine of incarnation.
35. Both believe in God cohabiting with a virgin.
36. Both were expiators.
37. Both believe in a future existence.
38. Both believe in the salvation of some and the damnation of others.
39. Both have altars and gorgeous temples.
40. Both believe in pilgrimages to holy places.
41. Both teach supernaturalism and miracles.
42. Both believe their founders divine.
43. Both teach love and forgiveness toward enemies.
44. Both think more of the next life than this.
45. Both encourage mendicancy and idleness.
46. Both exhibit love and charity to mankind.
47. Both deem self-abnegation a great virtue.
48. Both systems decry and condemn nature.
49. Both insist that their own system is the most divine and perfect.

In view of all these resemblances it is not singular that Father Huc, when he went to Asia as a missionary, declared that the devil had preceded him and established the Christian religion.

Buddhism had a priority of six centuries over Christianity, so it will not be difficult to say which is the original. If numbers of adherents are proof of divinity, Buddha in having twice the number of believers has twice the proofs of divinity.

The resemblances are many and striking, while some of the differences are equally striking. Buddhism has always been peaceful, it has in all cases carried the olive branch. It has not waged war and bloodshed, it has not persecuted, it has put none to death or torture for opinion's sake. While Christianity was inaugurated by the sword, it has waged more and bloodier wars than other systems of religion, save possibly Judaism; it has shed far more human blood than any other system; it has devastated a far greater extent of the earth's surface; it has persecuted millions for not believing its dogmas; it has put millions to death by implements of torture of the most infernal character; it has burnt millions at the stake; and other millions have been tortured and crushed nearly to death by its hellish inventions and cruelties.

It is not insisted that the points of resemblance between Christianity and the older systems of religion, many of which are not here pointed out, were borrowed absolutely from all the older systems, but that they are not original with Christianity is most positively demonstrated. The many resemblances are noticed in the briefest possible language, but I think every case is susceptible of positive proof.

Hesiod and Homer are believed to have been early Grecian poets who lived and sang about the gods, and taught morals nearly a thousand years before our era. I will give a quotation or two; first Hesiod on the muses:

The thrice three sacred maids whose minds are knit
In harmony, whose only thought is song,
They sing the laws of universal heaven,
And the pure manners of immortal gods;
Anon they bend their footsteps toward the mount,
Rejoicing in their beauteous voice and song
Unperishing. Far round the dusky earth
Rings with their hymning voices; and beneath
Their many rustling feet a pleasant sound
Ariseth, and they take their onward way
To their own father's presence.

Thus on the sprites and demons:

Thrice ten thousand demons rove
This breathing world, the immortals sent by Jove.
Guardians of men, their glance alike surveys
The upright judgments and the unrighteous ways.
Hovering, they glide to earth's remotest bound,
A cloud aerial veils their forms around.

Invisible, the gods are ever nigh,
Pass through our midst and bend the all-seeing eye.
The men who grind the poor, who wrest the right,
Aweless of heaven's revenge, stand naked in their sight.

Thus of the daughters of Jove:

They gave into my hand
A rod of marvelous growth, a laurel bough
Of blooming verdure; and within me breathed
A heavenly voice, that I might utter forth
All past and future things, and bade me praise
The blest and ever-living God.

God sends his teachers unto every age,
To every clime, and unto every race of men
With revelations fitted to their growth
And shape of mind, nor gives the realm of truth
Into the selfish rule of one sole race;
Therefore each form of worship that hath swayed
The life of man and given it to grasp
The master-key of knowledge, reverence,
Enfolds some germs of goodness and of right.

A few of the old Grecian teachers must be noticed. Thales taught over 600 years B.C.:

That which thou blamest in another do not thyself to thy neighbor.

The most ancient of all things is God, for he is uncreated.

The universe is the beautiful work of God.

True happiness consists in perfect, healthy, and moderate fortune, and a life free from effeminacy and ignorance.

How can actions be concealed when even our most secret thoughts are known to the gods?

Solon, one of the seven wise men of Greece, 638 B.C., taught good morals and gave excellent laws. Said he:

In all things let reason be your guide.

In everything you do consider the end.

To make laws against and ordain punishment for a crime that hitherto has never been known or heard of was the way to introduce it rather than prevent it.

Bias was another of the seven wise men, and was a very just ruler over the city of Priene, 600 B.C. He taught the very best of morals. These are some of his inculcations:

It is a proof of a weak mind to desire impossibilities.

The greatest infelicity is not to be able to endure misfortune patiently.

Great minds alone can support a sudden reverse of fortune.

The most pleasant state is to be always gaining.

Be not unmindful of the miseries of others.

If you are handsome do handsome things; if deformed supply the defects of your nature by your virtues.

Be slow in undertaking and resolute in executing.

Praise not a worthless man for the sake of his wealth.

Whatever good you do ascribe it to the gods.

Lay in wisdom as the store for your journey from youth to old age, for it is the most certain possession.

Many men are dishonest; then love your friend with some degree of caution, for he perchance may become your enemy.

Pittacus, another of the wise men, taught:

Do not that to your neighbor which you would take ill from him.

Speak ill of no one, not even of your enemies.

Pythagoras, the sage of Samos, lived about 600 years before the Christian era. He taught in this wise:

Unity is the principle of all things, and from this unity went forth an infinite duality.

Every quality which a man acquires originates a good or bad spirit, which abides by him in this world, end after death remains with him as a companion.

The discourse of a philosopher is vain if no passion of man is healed thereby.

Truth is to be sought with a mind purified from the passions of the body. Having overcome evil things, thou shalt experience the union of the immortal God with mortal man.

The noblest gifts of heaven to man are to speak truth and do good offices. These two things resemble the works of God.

Strength of mind depends upon sobriety, for this keeps reason unclouded by passion.

Youth should be habituated to obedience, for it will then find it easy to obey the authority of reason.

Honor the gods and revere an oath.

Every man ought to act and speak with such integrity that no one would have occasion to doubt his simple affirmation.

Do what you think to be right, whatever people think of you. Despise alike their censure and their praise.

The rational mind of man is more excellent than this sensitive soul, as the sun is more excellent than the stars.

Socrates was among the great teachers of Greece, and inculcated pure morals, a spirit of love and fraternity among men. Though he was put to death because he did not believe in the same kind of gods which the people accepted, he entertained a high reverence for all that is good, all that conduced to make man better and happier. He showed great courage and composure in the hour of death. Here is a sample of his lessons:

There is no better way to true glory than to endeavor to be good, rather than seem so.

Only the wise man can be brave, just, and temperate. Vice of every kind is ignorance. If a man is cowardly it is because he does not rightly appreciate the importance of life and death. He thinks death an evil, and flees from it. If he were wise he would know that death is a good thing, or at the worst an indifferent one, and therefore would not shun it.

If there be anything in man partaking of the divine nature, it must surely be the soul which governs and directs him; and yet no one considers this an object of the sight. Learn, therefore, not to despise those things which you cannot see; judge of the greatness of the power by the effects which are produced, and reverence the deity.

Plato was a pupil of Socrates, and flourished 430 B.C. He wrote and taught extensively, and was one of the most moral of men. A few specimens will suffice:

Honor is divine good. No evil thing is honorable.

There is no one so bad but love can make a god of him by virtue, so that his soul becomes like unto the supreme beauty.

The perfectly just man would be he who loves justice for its own sake, not for the honors and advantages that attend it; who would be willing to pass for unjust while he practiced the most exact justice; who would not suffer himself to be moved by disgrace or distress, but would continue steadfast in the love of justice, not because it is pleasant, but because it is right.

What light and sight are in this visible world, truth and intelligence are in the real unchangeable world.

It is impossible there should be much happiness in this life; but there is great hope that after death every person may obtain the things he most wishes for.

Zeno taught as follows:

A true philosopher, unless prevented, will faithfully serve the state.

Love is the god who gives the greatest safety.

Most people seek in the tavern for that pleasure which is to be found in labor.

Whether the slave have become so by conquest or by purchase, the master's title is bad.

Epicurus, who was born 340 B. C., and who has been much slandered and represented as a sensualist, was an able philosopher and a pure, moral teacher. Hear him:

I would wish you to think nothing good, or bad either, upon my decision. The first and last thing that I would say to a man is, Think for yourself.

A happy life is like neither a roaring torrent nor a stagnant pool, but a placid and crystal stream, that flows gently and smoothly along.

Perfect pleasure, which is happiness, you will have attained when you have brought your bodies and souls into a state of satisfied tranquility. To arrive at this much previous exertion is requisite; yet exertion, not violent, only constant and ever. At first the body, with its passions and appetites, demands gratification and indulgence. But beware! for here are the hidden rocks which may shipwreck your bark on its passage, and shut you out forever from the haven of repose.

Here is a specimen of his philosophical reasoning:

Nothing can ever spring from nothing, nor can anything ever return to nothing. The universe always existed and will always remain, for there is nothing into which it can be changed. There is nothing in nature, nor can anything be conceived, besides body and space. Body is that which possesses the properties of bulk, figure, resistance, and gravity. It is this alone which can touch or be touched. Space is the region where body is or may be occupied by body, and which affords an opportunity of moving freely. Besides these, body and space, no third nature can be conceived, for such a nature must either have bulk or solidity, or want them—that is, it must either be body or space. The universe, consisting of body and space, is infinite, for it has no limits. Bodies are infinite in multitude. Space is infinite in magnitude. The universe is to be conceived as immovable, since beyond it there is no place into which it can move; and as eternal and immutable, since it is neither liable to increase nor decrease, to production nor decay.

Isocrates, the poet, 338 B.C., taught this golden rule:

Act towards others as you desire them to act toward you.

Ceobulus said:

We should do good to our enemy and make him our friend.

Cleanthes taught:

Do nothing which will occasion grief to yourself and others.

Hillel, born 110 B.C., taught these beautiful sentiments, one of which is the Golden Rule:

Do not judge thy neighbor until thou hast stood in his place. Promote peace and be a friend of all men.

Do not unto another what thou wouldst not have another do unto thee. This is the whole law; the rest is mere comment.

Cicero, the Roman statesman and orator, taught many excellent truths:

We are created for the sake of mankind and to be useful to each other.

Nature endears man to man.

Nothing is more natural to man than kindness.

Knowledge seems isolated and barren unless accompanied by love of all men and trust in our common brotherhood.

All men are plainly bound together. Duty is always performed when the advantage of mankind is sought.

He is a good man who benefits as many people as possible and harms nobody.

True philosophers have not neglected the advantage and interests of mankind. Care for other men and serve the common brotherhood.

Nothing is so much in accord with nature as utility. The standard of utility is the same as that of morality.

Whatever is really usefnl is virtuous, though it does not at first seem so.

Seneca, a famous philosopher and teacher, taught excellent moral precepts:

The grandest of empires is to rule one's self. There is nothing grand that is not also calm.

Who has most? He who desires least. Throw away all anxiety about life and make it pleasant.

If you hear that others have spoken ill of you, consider whether you have not done the same and about many people.

How much better to heal an injury than to avenge it! I shall take the world as my country.

Guard rigorously that social tie which binds man to man and establishes the rights common to the human race.

Life is warfare, and those who climb up and down steep paths and go through dangerous enterprises are the brave men and leaders in the camp; but to rest basely at the cost of others' labors is to be a coward, safe because despised.

There are many others of the ancient moral teachers whom I cannot even name; but I have already occupied too much space, and must leave many unmentioned some who lived years before Jesus and others after. Among the latter were Antoninus and Marcus Aurelius. Their moral sentiments are well worth quoting, and have hardly been surpassed.

In the quotations I have made two objects prompted me; first, to give specimens of the sacred writings of the heathens; second, to show that they abounded with good moral teachers. Jesus may have said some things they did not say, but not many. If he had his peculiarities and his special line of thought, there was nothing strange about it. He thought and taught like other men. One thing may be regarded as settled: his most admired sentiments and morals were earlier taught by others; and it is untrue to assert that he was the author of all the morality of the world, or that his was better than what others have taught.

I will have to defer a reply to your claims of what Christianity has done for the world till my next.

Yours truly, D. M. B.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As we hear through the Liberal Press from time to time of the continued violation of Girard's will by dishonest religious bigots in control, why is it that the Liberals of the country, and more especially of Pennsylvania, do not put a stop to it? It is time, I think, that a move was made and something done in this direction. Who among the Liberals of Pennsylvania will inaugurate the move? I will be one to share the legal expense of enforcing the requirements and observance of the will. WM. HART.

[This is a good suggestion. Let it be acted upon without further delay. Let it be throroughly shown to the world the iniquity the Philadelphia Christians hav been doing in this matter.—ED. T. S.]

AN INFIDEL ABROAD. D. M. Bennett's letters from Europe. $1.50.

Letters from Friends.

BELVIDERE, N. Y., May 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As you hav decided to encompass the globe, please accept the five dollars inclosed herein. I hope you will hav a safe and prosperous trip, and that we may hav the privilege of grasping you by the hand in the future. We hav just had a call from a Methodist clergyman, and, to our surprise, he took his leave without asking after our spiritual welfare; but doubtless he had ascertained our ideas of religion before calling and thought best not to attack us this time. J. Y. CROSBY.

OAKFIELD, MICHIGAN, June 9, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Please find inclosed $5 to help you a little on the trip round the world. I hav not made any promises before, but I thought better late than never. E. I. WELLMAN.

ATLANTA, GA., May 27, 1881.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: Inclosed please find post-office order for $7—$5 for the world trip, and $1.50 for a new subscriber; for the balance please send me a copy of "John's Way." Now, Bro. Bennett, I wish you health, happiness, and success on the trip. Yours sincerely, GEORGE DISBROW.

OWEN SOUND, ONT., CAN., May 22, 1881.

MY DEAR BENNETT: Credit me for the $5 for the voyage round the globe. I hope you will receive enough—yea, more than enough—to carry you round and safely back to your sanctum. Do be careful of your health above all things. I would rather ten thousand times you would stop at home than that anything should befall you while away. Should you go, we will all hope for the best, and may all the gods protect you! Yours, as Mr. Chainey says, for liberty or death, A. F. THOMSON.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., June 14, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find post-office order for $7, $5 of which please place to my credit on the round-the-world fund, and for the remaining $2 please send me the "Bible of Bibles." May you hav a pleasant and profitable trip, and may both you and your excellent paper liv for many years to come, is the wish of your friend and admirer.

REUBEN PUNNETT.

CLEMENT, ILL., June 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Find inclosed my $5, for which please add another star to the galaxy of names that propose to send you round the world for the benefit of mankind. Hope when you are ready to start that every name in the list you publish will hav that shining star before his name. May health and good luck be your portion during your travels, and for many years to come. CHAS. C. MOORE.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., May 22, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I inclose a draft for $8—$5 to help for the trip round the world, and $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I see by the tab expires with the 1st of May. May the trip be as successful as the one to Europe was is the prayer of your subscriber, MRS. MARY Y. B. HUMPHREY.

P. S.—My husband says that he will giv $5 toward building a monument in Central Park to the memory of Thomas Paine, the man that did more than any other, he thinks, to establish this republic, with all its imperfection, yet the best, as yet, on this earth and the educator of all the rest. M. H.

MOLINE, ILL., May 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for $15 for your trip round the world—$5 for myself and $5 for J. E. Owens, and $5 for Wm. H. Beeres.

Yours truly, H. S. WOOD.

JOLIET, ILL., May 29, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I was one of the few who favored your staying at home instead of making the long trip. If I am able I shall get your book when published, but cannot do anything now. Casey's letter in your last issue speaks my mind exactly, still I do hope you will liv to get home and stand at the helm again. Does Mair know when he is beaten?

Yours truly, J. B. CURTIS.

HARVARD, June 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed post-office order for $5.00 for the trip around the world, hoping and believing that the good wishes of the readers of your excellent paper will go with you, THE TRUTH SEEKER comes regular and is a welcome visitor. If you think you hav not enough to carry you around let us know and another five shall be forthcoming. Yours truly, ABRAM CORMACK.

CONCORD, KY., May 9, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: So you hav decided to go. Well, we hav so far been with the minority, but we feel content to abide by your decision. Out of the money inclosed please send "A Modern Symposium," $1.25; the "Bradlaugh Almanac," 25 cents, and "Huxley's Lay Sermons," $1.75, as advertised some time ago, the balance retain for yourself. We hope friends will not forget to aid Mr. Macdonald, and your faithful little wife in your absence. We hope, too, your venture may prove all the most sanguin anticipate, and that we may not, as some fear, hav to write the obituary of the best paper in the world. With both love and sympathy for Mrs. Bennett and many good wishes for yourself, we remain,

Sincerely yours. NEWTON and VIRGINIA VANCE.

LAKE CITY, IOWA, May 23, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: I hav not written you since about the time you returned from Albany last year. At that time I sent you $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $2 to lie over in case they arrested you again, otherwise I expected to take it out in papers or books. I now send you $2 more, which will make $4 for the paper the present year, and I call it cheap at that. I am late saying so, but of course I expect to send $5 when you make the call for the money to start on your long journey round the world, but I cannot say, like some, I fear your paper or cause will go down. I think it will go up. I once thought no man living could quite come up to yourself publishing a paper, but I am quite satisfied with Macdonald and your friends in the manner they conduct the paper in your absence; in fact, they all appear to let out an extra link when you are gone. The only thing I hav any trouble about is in regard to your health while making so long a journey. I must say it is a big undertaking. I am respectfully

Your friend, J. L. TOMPKINS.

POULTNEY, VT., May 29, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Please find inclosed postal order for $8.00—$3.00 to pay subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, $5.00 to redeem my pledge for your proposed trip around the world, and my best wish is that you may be successful in all you undertake.

Yours fraternally, SAML. POWELL.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will please find $8—$3 to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER account, and $5 to assist you on the trip round the world. I am among the last to subscribe for your trip round the world, simply because I believe you can do the Liberal cause three times the amount of good by staying in the United States. If you will spend the same amount of time in traveling through this country and writing up its true history I will pledge you $20; or, in other words, let the dead bury the dead. We hav enough, and more than enough, ten times over, for all the Ingersolls and Bennetts there is to do in showing up this already priest-ridden country.

Hoping that the trip may prove both pleasant and profitable, I am truly yours, B. REDFIELD.

[It will not be too late to carry out our friend's idea of doing up this country when we return from the other side of the globe.—ED. T. S.]

ESCANABA, MICH., May 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I received THE TRUTH SEEKER last night by which I learn that you expect to leave soon on your proposed journey. Inclosed please find the $5 promised. My wife joins me in wishing you a very pleasant trip, as well as good health, and a speedy and safe return. My good wife says please send your photograph before you go. Send me some leaflets, or anything I can use to help get some subscribers for the paper, and tell me how much it all amounts to, and I will put it in with my next remittance.

Yours for truth, CHAS. D. JOHNSON.

CENTRAL CITY, COL., May 29, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I am pleased to know that you hav decided to do for the people of this nineteenth century what no other man has done—leave your business, home associations, and comforts to go out into the wide, wide world in order that the intelligent and unprejudiced reader may hav an unbiased account of distant lands, holy and otherwise, which at the present time, to the best of my knowledge, is not to be found in any works published, all being in the interest of the Christian religion, or the writers were so much in fear of the prejudice existing in the minds of the public against anything not in accordance with the Bible teachings that they hav feared to giv the facts if not consistent with the accepted doctrins of Christianity. With your fearless spirit of telling things just as you find them, without any fear of a just God's wrath or the indignation of your Christian friends, I long to read the letters that will be floated back to our shores and sent out even to this remote portion of civilization that we may learn the true state of things pertaining to the countries from which this glorious institution sprang. Should you find among the old musty records of the Indies dates carrying the world far, far beyond the time of the creation of Adam, I beg of you do not, as I feel well assured many writers hav, hide it away out of sight that Christianity might not be injured by its publication. I think we can trust you to not hide any such rich "strikes," but will "gopher" through the whole extent of the "pocket" and share with us the "find." The first of the month with us is generally pay-day, when money is more plentiful than at other times; my promised shares will then be forthcoming. If I can send you more than the eight promised you can depend upon it I shall do so. Anything to beat the clergy out of their easy life and save the poor dupes from paying from their hard earnings to support an institution based entirely upon their credulity and superstition.

Truly yours, D. D. LAKE.

Down by the Lea.

BY CHARLES BRADLEY.

Of all the birds that fly or sing,
By fountain or in grove,
The dearest far of all to me
And sweetest is the dove.
It's made its nest by Laura's grave,
Upon the willow tree,
And as I sadly sigh beneath,
It sweetly mourns with me. —Old Song.

Down by the lea, where the dark, rolling river
Flows out through its banks to the sea,
That stream and its banks are dear to me ever,
For there I parted from thee!
For there I parted from thee!

The lark in the sky, thy voice in my heart,
Thy smile as the star lit the lea—
That glance and that smile can never depart—
They're weeping and smiling for me!
They're sighing and smiling for me!

There lieth that lea, there rolleth that river;
There whispers that sea to the shore;
But the light of the star hath departed forever—
My Mary returneth no more!
My Mary returneth no more!

Easter Sunday.

BY T. U. W.

The bells hav ceased ringing, ringing,
The choirs are now singing, singing,
"This is the day the Lord arose
So early from the dead."

. . . . . .

"The rising God forsakes the tomb,
In vain the tomb forbids him rise."
Why should they not add to it thus,
And so complete their priestly fuss.
We do suggest it as a rule,
To teach them how to play the fool.

"The rising God forsakes the tomb,"
Naked as from his mother's womb,
Since "linen cloth and napkin" stay
Where erst "the Lord of glory lay."

What had he on when Mary saw
This Galilean youth so raw?
Whence came his breeches, boots, and hat
His coat (the soldiers gobbled that)?

Perhaps disciples stole him clothes,
They did the ass (nobody knows):
He sat on two at the same time,
But how 'twas done we can't divine.

A puzzle tough that mule ride is,
Enough to raise a solemn quiz;
Why should we let the wonder pass,
Since Jesus rode both colt and ass?

About the clothes we can explain;
The angels to his rescue came;
His garments were materialized—
Why should a Christian be surprised?

It would not do for Magdalene,
Who was the first upon the scene,
To see her God of clothes bereft;
She'd loudly screamed and quickly left.

She knew him not, it seems, although
She unto him did weeping go;
The gardner she thought him to be,
He was such a fac simile.

She asked him where they'd laid her Lord,
He told her of his own accord
Who he was; but "touch me not,"
For I've not yet "gone up the spout."

Is not this story rather queer?
And yet our Easter friends each year
Do make a splurge about this thing,
And of their "risen savior" sing.

When Easter morn comes round again,
I do propose, let me arrange;
A chant I'll make somewhat like this,
Then who'll applaud, and who will hiss?

They ought to know their folly born
Of crudest lies, and "own the corn,"
Just giv them over once to me,
And I'll compose their homily.

And yet they'll chant, and yet they'll sing
Of God, their everlasting king;
He'll last as long as stamps hold out,
And then behold a Christian rout.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest inceptivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoronghly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY,

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's 'Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

12mo, 206pp. Price, $1.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

SOCIALISM.

A Reply to Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D. By an Independent Socialist.

12mo, 67pp., paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

Sixteen Saviors or None.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examins all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other, and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and themselvs, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF AMERICA.

It is a fact well known to every individual in this country that all new inventions hav been opposed by the very class of men who should make inquiry respecting the same. For instance, Fultou with his steamboat, and Stephensou with his locomotiv.

Then we had legislators in our Congress who looked upon Morse as a lunatic when he asked for a short line of telegraph between Baltimore and Washington. Yet today what should we do without our telegraph or steamboat and locomotiv?

THE INVENTORS OF ALL THESE THINGS HAV HAD TO BEAR THE INSULTS OF ALL SO-CALLED SCIENTISTS. WHY, EVEN SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, ONE OF THE GREATEST CHEMISTS THAT EVER LIVED—HE WITH ALL HIS LEARNING PROVED HIMSELF A FOOL WHEN HE RIDICULED THE IDEA OF LIGHTING OUR STREETS WITH GAS. HE SAID IT WAS AN IMPOSSIBILITY TO SO USE COAL GAS.

What to-day should we do without such a medium of light? Our sewing-machines—they were also opposed by those whose interest it was to oppose them. Thousands of instances may be quoted where articles now in daily use were ridiculed by the people whose interest it was to keep back the introduction of such inventions.

Now, then, as to the WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

THIS INVENTION IS AS NEW TO THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOOLYN AS WAS THE FIRST INTRODUCTION OF STEAM-ENGINS AND ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS, AND YET THE PEOPLE, ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, HAV NO MORE SENSE THAN TO ASK THEIR PHYSICIANS WHETHER OR NOT THEY SHALL WEAR WILSONIA GARMENTS. IT IS JUST AS REASONABLE TO ASK A COMMON TINKER TO MAKE YOU A GOLD WATCH, OR AN IDIOT TO SOLVE A MATHEMATICAL PROBLEM, AS TO ASK PRACTICING PHYSICIANS THEIR OPINION AS TO THE VALUE OF THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING. AND YET THIS INVENTION IS DESTINED TO OVERTHROW ALL FORMER METHODS OF TREATING DISEASE, AND OUR CHILDREN WILL WONDER HOW THEIR PARENTS COULD HAV BEEN SO HUMBUGGED AS TO POISON THEMSELVS WITH NOXIOUS DRUGS. PHYSICIANS THEMSELVS WHO HAV ADVANCED IN LIFE KNOW VERY WELL THAT MEDICIN IS A MISTAKE.

We hav in Brooklyn cases of diseases cured that hav been given over by the very best physicians, so called, in the city of Brooklyn. In the testimonies given below you hav the names of five Brooklyn physicians who had given over the patient to die.

Read these testimonials and then let these physicians answer why they fail to cure. Read Dr. Mansfield's evidence; also the evidence of Peter Lehlback, of Jersey City, whom fifty physicians of New Jersey and New York gave over as iucurable. Let these doctors explain why they failed to cure after four years of medical practice, costing that poor man $15,000. And yet the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, which they dared condemn, are all sufficient to cure in two months.

I WILL GIV ANY PHYSICIAN IN BROOKLYN $5,000 IF HE CAN DISPROVE ALL I SAY IN REFERENCE TO THE VALUE OF THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM IN TREATING DISEASE, AND WILL ALSO UNDERTAKE TO CURE NINE-TENTHS OF ALL HIS INCURABLES, FREE OF CHARGE, PROVIDED HE REGISTERS THE NAMES OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME.

I will also giv any patient $5,000 who has worn my goods in quantity and time as I direct aud has not received all the benefit I promised.

Read the following among the many testimonies given as to the virtues of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING:

HÆMATEMESIS.

(Bleeding from mucous membrane of Throat and Stomach.)

This almost seems incredible. But, nevertheless, this patient has come under the personal observation of Dr. Thayer, as well as all the others who have addressed their etters to him, and he affirms the truth of all they claim.

BROOKLYN, April 30, 1881.

DR. THAYER, My Dear Sir: I was first taken sick about the 15th of February, 1880. My first attack was like this: I coughed up two or three mouthfulls of blood, when I called a physician, who prescribed for hemorrhage from the lungs. I recovered slightly. Three weeks after I was awakened in the night with a cough, finding my mouth full of blood. Continued to spit blood for two days before it could be controled, which left me very weak. Recovered just enough to get around again in a very weakened condition.

Whenever I would stoop to pick up anything the blood would come up into my mouth.

Drs. Shirwell and McEvette both declared that I could never recover again. From July, 1880, to September 29, 1880, I was occasionally spitting up blood. Was suddenly taken sick one night while in the street. This attack of bleeding continued for twenty-four days. Spitting? No; I should better describe it by saying vomiting up blood with every cough. Dr. Sheppard was called in and said it was not possible for me to liv till spring—that I shouldn't liv till April, 1881. Dr. Dower said he had done for me all he could. Dr. Carreau said one of my lungs was gone—THAT I COULD NOT RECOVER.

Early in March, 1881, I gave up the doctors in disgust. Upon the 21st of March, 1881, the "WILSONIA" appliances were put on me while I was in bed, as I was too weak to leave the same. Four days before this time, I—also my friends—thought I was dying.

Upon the 26th of March, 1881, I felt strong enough to get up and dress myself for the first time in three months. Then upon April 8, 1881, I was strong enough to ride two miles and call upon Mr. Wilson.

Now, three weeks since that time, I feel strong enough to WALK THAT DISTANCE. I have had no HEMORRHAGES since I put on the Appliances, and feel my strength growing better and better each day; in fine, I feel stronger and better than I have since I was first taken sick. Yours respectfully,

MICHAEL MARRION,
458 Third avenue, Brooklyn.

DR. THAYER, Dear Sir: It was about eighteen years ago that I was first attacked with sciatica, which developed into chronic rheumatism I hav employed allopathy, homeopathy, electricity, and, in fact, ALL PATHYS. Hav employed the best medical skill in Brooklyn and Troy, New York, but they never cured me.

I commenced to wear the "WILSONIA" just before the holidays [but had no faith in them], with this result: I am stronger, sleep better, hav a better appetite, have increased in flesh and weight, feel better, AM BETTER. Have slept on hop pillows, and done almost everything for my previous nervous prostration, all of which I hav no need for now since wearing the "WILSONIA" Garments. Yours truly,

MRS. JANE SCOTT,
332 Clinton street, Brooklyn.

We place our Electro Magnetic Appliance on the body, and we succeed in influencing the internal organs, tissues, fluids, etc., by acting directly on the arterial blood, which absorbs a due amount of the magnetic force, thus invigorating the whole system, there being no cell or tissue unpenetrated by the blood. It is impossible to estimate the number of persons who lose their life from a neglect of the conditions necessary for its preservation.

NASAL CATARRH AND OBESITY.

BROOKLYN, May 30, 1881.

PROFESSOR WILSON, Dear Sir: All my life long I hav sufferred from nasal catarrh. Three moaths ago you persuaded me to wear your Magnetic Clothing. The offensiv disease is nearly eradicated, and I can read aloud, sing, or go up and down stairs with comparativ ease—something I hav not done in years without weariness. I was also annoyed with an excess of fat. Much of this has abated, and I hav gained a proportionate degree of muscular strength I measure over three inches less around the body—below the waist—since wearing your Garments.

I supposed that during the warm weather they would be burdensome. On the contrary, I am as comfortable as the present oppressiv heat will permit any one to be in ordinary dress. MRS. E. G. CHIPMAN,

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

[CASE OF PROFESSOR HATCH SMITH.]

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,

C. HATCH SMITH.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommeuded by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.

Desirous of knowiug what Dr Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiratiou set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were ou her." Very uaturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "uo phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results iu repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, aud believing, yes, kuowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

THE FAR-FAMED "WILSONIA."

moves grandly on, conquering and to conquer every form of disease known to men. It triumphs over even the most complicated forms within the short space of ten or twelve months. Read the following glowing tribute from the ready pen of the world-renowned Dr. Mansfield, of New York. It was received to-day:

61 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET, N. Y., April 9, 1881.

DEAR WILSON: I am pleased to inform you that I am quite well from the use of your appliances. Fifteen days since I could not walk more than a quarter of a mile without resting. To-day I can walk three miles without fatiguing me in the least. I only wish that those who suffer as I did could know the efficacy of the "WILSONIA" as I do.

Mrs. Mansfield has been and now is under the care of a celebrated physician, and up to yesterday has beeu suffering from debility attended with much pain Last evening I proposed to take my magnetic suit and put it upon her. She consented, and had not it upon her body over ten minutes before she acknowledged she was free from pain. She slept well all night, without experiencing the slightest pain whatever. I regret I hav not two suits, but I will put mine on her again to-night. I dare not go without it myself during the day time. Several ladies hav called on Mrs. M. this morning, and her theme is the "WILSONIA."

I hav sent your representativ on Broadway several customers already, and in every case I tell them you MUST DRESS them as YOU DEEM prudent. I hav two more on the "anxious seat" that will be converted soon. I hope to send you a $1,000 worth of customers this year.

God bless you, dear WILSON, for what you hav done and are doing for suffering humanity.

Respectfully, J. V. MANSFIELD.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

(The patient taken off from crutches.)

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

MY DIFFICULTY IS THAT MANY PERSONS WILL BECOME ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, WILL SWALLOW MEDICIN ENOUGH TO FLOAT A STEAMSHIP, AND RUB IN LINIMENTS AND OINTMENTS ENOUGH TO TAN THE SKIN TILL IT BECOMES LIKE THE SAIL OF A SHIP; AND THEN, HEARING OF MY MARVELOUS CURES, WILL EXPECT, ON PUTTING ON MY GOODS, TO JUMP INTO NEW LIFE IN TWO OR THREE MONTHS. THIS IN MOST CASES IS AN IMPOSSIBILITY, AND PERSONS GOVERNED BY SUCH EXPECTATIONS HAD BETTER NOT WASTE THEIR TIME OR MY OWN IN CALLING UPON ME,

FRIENDS OF THE SICK POOR OF BROOKLYN,

Enforce your physicians and the Charity Commissioners of Brooklyn to accept my offer to them in your behalf.

I renew it here as follows:

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

MULTIFORM DISEASE CLASSIFIED,

And the range of price for the "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits warranted to effect a cure in every case, when the suit is worn continuously for the space of twelve months—frequently will do this in half that time.

All forms of PULMONARY DISEASE, such as Phthisis Pulmonalis, or Consumption. Bronchial Hemorrhage, Pulmonary Hemorrhage, Croupous Pneumonia, Catarrhal Pueumonia, Induration, or Hardening of the Lung, Bronchial Asthma, Tussis Convulsiver, or Whooping Cough, Inflammation of the Pleura, or Pleurisy, Hydro-Thorax, or Water in the Chest, Pneumo-Thorax, or Air in the Chest, Epitaxis, or Bleeding from the Nose.

The above forms of disease require "Wilsonia" Magnetic suits which aggregate in cost from $38.50 to $73.50, according to the precise character of the disease and condition of the patieut. These same couditions govern or determin the quantity of goods and their aggregate cost in every case mentioned in the following classes:

All forms of Cardiac, or HEART DISEASE, require magnetic suits ranging in price from $38.50 to $73.50.

All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of DIGESTION, such as Diphtheritic Inflammation of the Pharynx, Syphilitic Affections of the Pharynx, Inflammation of the Œsophagus, Stricture of the Œsophagus, Acute Gastric Catarrh, or Acute Catarrh of the Stomach, Gastritis, or Inflammation of the Stomach, Carcinoma, or Cancer of the Stomach, Hematomesis, or Hemorrhage of the Stomach, Dyspepsia, Scrofulous and Tuberculous Diseases of the Intestins and Mesenteric Glands, Colic, Gastric Fever, Neuralgia of the Stomach and Intestins, Peritouitis.

The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $93.50.

All forms of Disease of the Liver and Bile-Ducts, such as Hyperemia, or Enlargement of the Liver, Acute Yellow Atrophy of the Liver, Tuberculosis of the Liver, Cirrhosis of the Liver, Acute and Chronic Hepatitis, or Acute and Chronic Inflammation of the Liver, Fatty Liver, Cancer of the Liver, etc.

The above require suits costing from $38.50 to $83 50.

The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $108.50.

All forms of DISEASE of the NERVOUS SYSTEM, such as Softeuing of the Brain, Hemaphlega, or Paralysis of the Lateral Halves of the Body, Pariphlegia, or Paralysis of the Upper or Lower Half of the Body, Paralysis Agitans, or Shaking Palsy, Apoplexy, Cerebral Hemorrhage, Cerebritis, or Inflamation of the Brain, Cerebro-Spinal Meningitis, Sclerosis of the Brain, Hydrocephalus Acquisitus, or Water ou the Brain Aequired. Hydrocephalus Congenitus, or Water on the Brain from Birth, Myelitis, or Inflammation of the Spinal Marrow, Hemorrhage of the Spinal Cord, or Spinal Apoplexy, Tabes Dorsualis, or Consumption of the Spinal Cord, Locomotor Ataxia, or Progressiv Grey Degeneration of the Posterior Columns of the Spinal Cord, Ticdouloureux, Neuralgia, Neuralgia Ischia Dica, or Sciatica, Chorea, or St. Vitus' Dance, Trismus, or Lock-jaw. Epilepsy, or Falling Sickness, Eclampsia Infantum, Hysteria, Catalepsy, Hypochondriasis.

The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $150.00.

All forms of DISEASE of the SKIN, such as Eczema and its several varieties, require suits costing from $48 50 to $73.50.

All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of LOCOMOTION, such as Rheumarthrisis Acute, or Flying Gout, Acute Articular Rheumatism, Chronic Articular Rheumatism, Deformities of the Joints, Gout, Progressiv Muscular Atrophy.

The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $200.00.

All forms of ACUTE and CHRONIC INFECTIOUS DISEASE, such as Measles, Scarlet Fever, Small Pox, Chicken Pox, Typhus Fever, Typhoid Fever, Relapsing Fever. Intermittent Fever, Dysentery, Syphilis, Congeuital and Hereditary.

The above require magnetic suits costing $93.00.

All DISORDERS OF NUTRITION which do not depend upon Infection, such as Chlorisis, Scrofula, Diabetes (both varieties), Scarbutus, or Scurvy, etc.

The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $68.50.

HERNIA requires Magnetic Appliances costing from $53.50 to $93.50.

VARICOSE VEINS require Magnetic Appliances costing from $58.50 to $108.50.

N. B.—When "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits are ordered to be forwarded by mail or express [they should go by express wherever practicable], do not neglect to state the size of head, of the waist, the wrist, and length of the foot of the person for whom they are ordered. All checks and post-office orders should be made payable to William Wilson, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn. N. Y.

CONSULT

You must Not Despair! Your Case is Curable!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.

Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:

"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."

The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted anthor and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."

Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.

Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Gems of Thought.

TAM SAMSON'S well-worn clay here lies;
Ye canting zealots spare him.
If honest worth in heaven rise,
Ye'll mend ere ye win near him.
—Burns.

IT has always been claimed that man was the last, best, and most perfect work of creativ power. And if it be a mark of superiority to be the last, the very last, then, according to the record these people go by, woman will win to-day for being still more perfect, as she was formed after man himself was.—Elmina D. Slenker.

IF the blind acceptance of authority appears to a man in its true colors as mere private judgment in excelsis [in the highest matters], and if he hav the courage to stand alone, face to face with the abyss of the eternal and unknowable, let him be content, once for all, not only to renounce the good things promised by "infallibility," but even to bear the bad things which it prophesies; content to follow reason and fact in singleness and honesty of purpose, wherever they may lead, in the sure faith that a hell of honest men will, to him, be more endurable than a paradise full of angelic shams.—Huxley.

WHEN we hav exhausted the here it will be time enough to think of the hereafter. Who has filled the present to his satisfaction? What hours hav passed that we would not like to call back and liv better? What year has come and gone that has left no wish to improve it? The future is an endless to-morrow. The universe is infinit. We share its glories, and are heirs to its stars and skies; to its earth and flowers; to its days and nights. . . . While the future is closed to us, let us make the most of the present. Learn to treat life as an opportunity to gather wisdom, to help our fellow-beings, and to enjoy the things of earth in a sensible and rational manner.—L. K. Washburn.

WE may lay it down as an incontestable axiom that, in all the operations of art and nature, nothing is created—an equal quantity of matter both before and after the experiment. The quality and quantity of the elements remain precisely the same, and nothing takes place beyond changes and modifications in the combinations of these elements. Upon this principle the whole art of performing chemical experiments depends. We must always suppose an exact equality between the elements of the body examined and those of the products of its analysis.—Lavoisier [1743–1794; guillotined].

But past is all his fame. The very spot
Where many a time he triumphed is forgot.

THE conception of creation is impossible. We are utterly unable to construe it in thought as possible that the complement of existence has been either increased or diminished, much less can we conceive an absolute origination of substance. We cannot conceive either, on the one hand, nothing becoming something, or, on the other, something becoming nothing. The words "creation" and "destruction" hav no value except as applied to phenomena. You may destroy a gold coin, but you do not destroy the metal. You may transmute the metal, but you hav only destroyed the condition; you hav not affected the substance. Creation and destruction denote change of phenomena; they do not denote origin or cessation of substance.—Bradlaugh's Plea for Atheism.

No man is so obstinate an admirer of the old times as to deny that medicin, surgery, botany, chemistry, engineering, navigation, are better understood now than in any former age. We conceive that it is the same with political science. Like those physical sciences which we hav mentioned, it has always been working itself clearer and clearer, and depositing impurity after impurity. There was a time when the most powerful of human intellects were deluded by the gibberish of the astrologer and the alchemist; and just so there was a time when the most enlightened and virtuous statesmen thought it the first duty of a government to persecute heretics; to found monasteries; to make war on Saracens. But time advances; facts accumulate; doubts arise; faint glimpses of truth begin to appear, and shine more and more with the perfect day.—Macaulay.

WHAT a pity that a genius like Carlyle should depreciate the efforts and peculiar talents of such a man as "old Lamb," as he denominates Charles Lamb, who was far in advance of him in some things, for Lamb never distorted a truth! Oh, how pure and sweet and natural are his delineations of character! His touches of humor permeate gently every cranny of the sunniest side of our nature, hightening those sincerities of the heart which are opposed to a false civilization! Lamb says that the dying saint takes in death "like honey and butter. He dies splendidly, like an actor upon the stage; and after all his struggles, raptures, and credulity, his distorted vision and wasted opportunities for the possession of all that is good, he dies a deceived soul." He has scoffed at the sweet face of truth and all her earnest words. He prefers a soulless allegory—a gaudily-dressed angel. Lamb also remarks that the character of a saint and his death-bed are two very different things. A namby-pamby, selfish life, a death of glory; the life of a coward, the death of a hero. The life that reads and composes the meanest prose is extinguished in the midst of a chapter radiant with oriental imagery—a heaven of scenic effects, studded with stars, embalmed with fragrance. The saint departs gorgeously robed, breathing out a holiness which he never knew or practiced here. And the wicked man, how does he effect his exit from this earthly stage, where he was not totally depraved? He goes as a fiend, to be badly toasted on a fork by another devil much stronger and older in sin than himself. Leaving Lamb for a moment, what would the divine Uncle Toby say to this? After clasping the poor damned wretch to his bosom, he would calmly remark, "Is not heaven wide enough for the poor sinner and his loving God?"—Alhaza.

CLOSE COMMUNIONISTS.—"If there ain't a change in the religious world pretty soon I'm going to throw down the gospel and take up the grubbing-hoe," remarked an old man yesterday. "I've rid a circuit for forty odd years, and I'm treated worse than when I first begun."

"What is your cause of complaint, parson?" asked a bystander.

"My recentest cause is one what flakes all others," answered the circuit rider, wiping a drop of water from his peaked nose with the sleeve of his brown jeans coat.

"I hav preached a good deal here in Little Rock, and until recently it has allers been my belief that if a man could pull through here he could pull through anywhere. But I was blind wrong. Yesterday I went in the Gum Lick district, where I had an appointment to preach in the school-house. When I got there I found the old man Ruggles, a hardshell Baptist, had got in ahead of me. I went in without any ill feeling, intending to wait until he got through, when I would muster my courage and take the field. After awhile he got through preaching and announced that sacrament would be taken when the boy got back from the still-house. 'My congregation uses whisky instead of wine,' he went on, 'and Arkansaw corn-bread instead of your wheat fixin's.' Just then the boy arrived and the old man took the cob stopper from the black chunk bottle and began to pour out the whisky. Now if there's anything that strikes me natural it's whisky, and thinking I could preach better after being warmed up a little I went up to the table and reached out after the bottle, when the old man looked at me and said:

"'Ain't you a Methodist?'

"'Yes, sir.'

"'Don't you know that we don't allow the Methodist to commune with us? Do you take this counter for a free lunch—eh? No, sir; if you are not a customer of the Lord you can't eat here.'

"'I've a right to the table,' I said, 'and I'll help myself.'

"'Tech that bottle and I'll lift you.'

"I grabbed the bottle and the old man struck me with a pone of corn bread and knocked me down. Then somebody kicked me and all hands dragged me out."

"You got into a nest of close communists, did you?" asked the bystander.

"Ruther like it. Why, them fellers would snatch a piece of bread from Jacob and tear the bosom outen Abraham's shirt. No, sir; until there is more freedom in the church I shan't renew my connections. Where can a feller get a two-pound hoe?"

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 8. No. 28. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, July 9, 1881. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

PASTOR SALE of the Baptist church at Mason City, Iowa, has been deposed for Beecherism.

IN view, possibly, of Mr. Bradlaugh's muscularity, two sons of Anak in policeman's attire hav been added to the police force of the House of Commons.

DR. SCHLIEMANN has lately returned to Athens from a tour of exploration in the Troad, and has since started for Berlin. Among other discoveries he believes that he has ascertained the site of the altar of the Twelve Gods.

A STROKE of lightning damaged to the extent of $500 the new Methodist church on Deal Island. The dedication, for which all things were ready, was postponed until the shattered structure could be repaired.

THE twenty million cinchona trees planted in Ceylon in 1880 are expected to yield in six years ten million pounds per year, but it is believed that the demand will fully keep up with the supply, so that prices will not decline.

THE receipts of the New York post-office for the year ending yesterday amounted to $3,782,000, and the expenses to $850,000. The business for the fiscal year just ended was 10 per cent. larger than that of the preceding year.

THERE arrived at Castle Garden in the month of June 59,416 immigrants, making the total for the first six months of the year 241,498. This is 64,513 more than arrived in the first half of 1880, in which the arrivals were more numerous than ever before.

THE sentence of Herr Most is infamous. All this pious rage against inciting to murder is nonsense. His punishment is intended as an abridgment of the rights of the press, and nothing less. The victim was right—he might as well be in Russia as in England so far as freedom of speech is concerned.—Truth.

THE capacity of the steel works of the world is estimated at about 3,000,000 tons a year. The Bessemer works in England contribute about 800,000 tons; the United States, 750 tons more; Germany, about 500,000; France about 275,000; Belgium, 150,000; Austria, 250,000; and Russia and Sweden about 150,000.

A CARMAN, says the City Press, recently driving at an immoderate pace along Fetter lane, London, ran against a truck that was standing by the pavement; the truck spun round and caught a ladder standing against a house; the ladder fell and hit a dog; the dog ran foul of a lady who was passing at the moment, whose foot was trodden upon by a passer by, and she had to be put into an omnibus and sent home.

THOMAS MYERS, a negro, living at Rantowles' S. C., conceived that it was his duty to offer up a human sacrifice to God. Nobody could reason the idea out of his head, though on other subjects he was rational. He chose his son, aged thirteen, as the victim. The boy followed him into the woods unsuspectingly, when ordered to do so, and was killed by a shot. Myers glories in the deed, and believes that it makes his salvation sure.

NEW HAMPSHIRE has a new law taxing church property when it exceeds $10,000 in value. The Congregational church of Manchester refused to pay, on the ground that the act was unconstitutional; but the Supreme Court has decided that, under the Constitution of the state, it is competent for the legislature to treat church property like any other in the matter of taxation, and that the fact of long exemption does not affect the question.

DR. PATERSON writes from the Bridge of Allan, Scotland: "I always keep a number of toads in my orchid houses for the purpose of destroying vermin. The other morning, while watching two males, I was highly amused to see them hav a regular set-to fight. They went at each other in a regular scientific manner, sparring and boxing with their fore-paws, and butting with their heads. After a while they seemed to get tired, coolly sat down, and viewed each other with great complacency. From my earliest days I hav been in the habit of watching the ways of toads, and never saw them fight before."

A SUPPER and concert were given during commencement week at the Illinois State University, Bloomington. Waltz music was played and the young couples danced to it. On the following Sunday the Rev. J. W. Webb preached in the Methodist church of the place on the sinfulness of round dancing, as he had observed it on that occasion. He characterized it as "wicked, fashionable hugging," and said, "After 2 o'clock at night I saw parties, male and female, under one shawl, promenading the streets locked in each other's arms and going into alleys." The dancers could hav borne all but this remark with equanimity, but as to it they publish the retort that the preacher spoke in a "foul, false, and unchristian manner."

IT is unpleasant when a controversy arises concerning sermon stealing, and brethren accuse each other of stealing ideas. This has arisen in the case of Dr. Lorimer, of Chicago, and Dr. Joseph Parker, of London, and has gone so far as to the point where Dr. Parker cables a flat denial of the charge that he appropriated some of Dr. Lorimer's sermons. When it was at first noised abroad that this had been done, it was remarked that Dr. Parker was now in a position in which explanation on his part would be necessary. Dr. Parker's explanation now throws the burden on Dr. Lorimer, who, in his turn, will hav to rise and explain. A lively controversy may be expected between these gentlemen, backed by their friends.

RESISTANCE to the now prohibitory laws of Kansas has gone so far that while juries in the cities refuse to convict liquor sellers, even upon the clearest evidence, in Atchison the Common Council, with the co-operation of its presiding officer, the mayor, has adopted an ordinance providing for the granting of licenses to taverns and saloons. This action was taken in express ridicule and defiance of the prohibitory constitutional amendment and the laws based upon it. The temperance men hav since then held a mass meeting, and call upon the mayor to resign, while Gov. St. John threatened to call out the militia and put the laws into execution by force of arms. All this because the population of the cities is not willing to be deprived of its beer by the rural population's temperance predilections.

THE downfall of the Rev. O. C. Sales was brought about by the fright of Mrs. Brewer when she thought she was dying. He undertook, being her pastor, to prepare her mind for death, but she knew him to be a hypocrite, and declared that his ministrations were worthless for death-bed purposes. Therefore she turned to the attending physician for consolation, and placed in his hands a package of love letters which Sales, though a married man, had written to her. She recovered, and the physician turned the letters over to the officers of the church. They arraigned the pastor privately. He professed penitence, and begged them to "do unto him as they would hav others do unto them if caught in a similar way." They decided to retain him as their minister, but the scandal got out, and the congregation forced him to resign.

THERE is a growing doubt among the ablest biologists as to there being any fixed relation between brain structure and mental function. Sir J. Lubbock has pointed out that, although the anthropoid apes ranked next to man in bodily structure, ants claimed that place in the scale of intelligence. Once he had watched an ant working, and it worked from six in the morning to ten at night without intermission, carrying one hundred and eighty-seven larvæ to its nest. Prof. Calderwood said that it became apparent that anatomical structure was not in itself an adequate guide in determining comparativ importance in the scale of organic existence, and that even comparativ brain structure could not be taken as a sole test of the measures of intelligence. The whole order of ants presented quite exceptional difficulties for the theory of evolution, and also for the theory of intelligence, which seeks to account for it by complexity of brain structure.

SPEAKING about association or commercial union or independence or federation of the empire or any other political change, the fair view to take of it, is that any person who has anything to say that he believes will add to the sum total of human intelligence or to the sum total of human happiness, ought not only to be allowed to say it but should be encouraged in the saying of it. Why not? We are all going through the world for the last time, and the thing to do is to make it as comfortable a place to liv in, and to leave for those who come after us, as possible. We do not advocate annexation; we should be content to see the country take its place among the independent nations of the earth. But if anybody thinks that annexation would be a good thing for the country, he should be at liberty to say so, just as he would be at liberty to advocate legislation for Ireland or federation of the empire, if he believes it would be a good change to make. To prevent people from saying the thing that is in their minds and hearts, is to put a premium on hypocrisy.—Toronto Telegram.

ANOTHER new application of electricity as a motor has been experimented in during the last few days in Paris. M. G. Trouve, a well-known electrician, has devised a method of apylying the electrical current to the propulsion of a boat, and so far the results hav been eminently satisfactory. The experiments hav been made on the Seine, on several occasions, with a small boat containing from two to six persons. M. Trouve's electric motor consisted of a Siemens coil, which by a simple but ingenious arrangement is made to transmit its power to a three-bladed screw at the stern of the boat. The motor itself is fixed on the upper part of the rudder, which it follows in its movements as it does also the screw. The motor with its accessories, does not weigh more than five kilogrammes. M. Trouve's apparatus may be adapted to any boat, and there seems no reason whatever why it might not be so modified as to applicable to vessels of much larger dimensions than that experimented on. Experiments in navigation by electricity were made on the Neva 1830 by Jacobi, but the method adopted had so many drawbacks as to be practically useless.

FROM the recently issued report of Prof. Baird, the fish commissioner of the United States, we glean some very interesting facts regarding the recent development of sponge culture. Among the more recent enterprises in the way of the artificial propagation of aquatic animals Prof. Oscar Schmidt of the University of Gratz has been so successful in in his preliminary efforts in the artificial propagation of the sponge that the Austrian government has authorized him to attempt the development of the industry on the coast of Dalmatia. The process is very simple, consisting in selecting the proper season in the spring, dividing a living marketable sponge into numerous small pieces, and then fastening them to stakes driven into the sea bottom. These fragments at once begin to grow out, and at the end of a given time each one becomes an entire sponge. According to Dr. Schmidt, three years is a sufficient length of time to obtain from very small pieces fair-sized sponges. In one experiment the cost of raising 4,000 sponges amounted only to $50, and this included the interest for three years on the capital employed.

News of the Week.

GOV. CORNELL has vetoed Murphy's Anti-Spy bill.

HANNIBAL HAMLIN has been appointed Minister to Spain.

FIFTY-NINE thousand emigrants arrived at this port in June.

CORNELL has been defeated in all the races the crew has rowed in England.

RAILROAD COMMISSIONER FRENCH has been suspended by Secretary Kirkwood.

THE anti-monopoly party of this state is pushing its organization vigorously.

IT is reported that Grant has sold his Missouri farm to Jay Gould for $75,000.

YALE was victorious at the University boat race at New London, Ct., on the 1st.

GRISCOM still continues his fast, and will probably go his forty-two days without food.

THE empress of Germany is seriously ill. Bismarck is recovering from his indisposition.

FOURTH OF JULY was celebrated very quietly on account of the assassination of the President.

A BILL was introduced in the legislature at Albany last week to protect skunks. It was tabled.

THE schools of this city are all closed for the summer. The school expenditures for the past year hav been $2,690,533.66.

EDWIN BOOTH, the actor, has returned to this city on account of the health of his wife, who is not expected to liv long.

THE White Star steamer Britannic went ashore off the coast of Ireland on the 3d, but sustained little damage, and no lives were lost.

THE senatorial deadlock at Albany still continues. Platt has withdrawn from the fight on account of a scandal connecting his name with a lewd woman.

A MAN has been convicted of bribing a voter in Philadelphia and sentenced to six months' imprisonment; but he was the smallest kind of a politician. His political employer was acquitted.

THE crops at Tewksbury, Mass., were seriously damaged by a hail-storm on the 4th. A terrific cyclone also struck White Plains on the same day, entailing a large loss upon the farmers.

FRANKLIN, N. H., was visited last week by a tornado accompanied by hail. Many buildings were totally destroyed, the roofs being lifted off and the walls blown down by the force of the wind. A Methodist and Catholic church were among them.

A MOST dastardly attempt to take the life of President Garfield was made last Saturday by one Charles Guiteau, who is thought by some to be insane. The President was about to take the train for Jersey City, and had gone in company with Secretary Blaine to the Potomac depot. Arriving about ten minutes before the train started, he entered the ladies' parlor, and was immediately approached from behind by Guiteau, who fired two shots from a heavy revolver. The first ball entered Garfield's arm; the second struck him in the back and penetrated the liver. The President was conveyed home, where he lies between life and death, with the chances a little against him. Guiteau was arrested and conveyed to jail. The utmost excitement prevailed in Washington, and it was with difficulty the people were prevented from hanging the assassin. A file of soldiers around the jail were necessary to guard that structure. Vice-President Arthur and all the cabinet are at the White House attending upon the wounded President, and the most eminent medical men constantly watch by his bedside. The governments of Europe hav telegraphed their sympathy.

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XIII.

"'Religions proper, as far as they point to recompense and morality, are not at all so related that they should influence each other,' answered Alamontada. 'Religion, or the belief in God and immortality, as necessary as it may be, exists, properly speaking, for itself alone, and has with that which we call reward of virtue no connection, as true virtue is independent, and without any regard to God, of immortality, of recompense.

"'But it is a good idea to make religion, in that sense, an educator of immature humanity. It is the safest support, on which we gradually lift ourselvs up from the low sensuality to independence of reason.

"'The eternal moral law, dwelling within us, in all times and regions the same, tells us how we, as reasonable beings, should act. And if I now act so, as I ought according to this eternal law, then I am what I really should be, a free, self-acting, definit spirit—a spirit issuing only from within itself, only through its own, within-itself hidden law. If I do something for my profit, then I am not virtuous; every animal does the same; it fears in many a case punishment, it receives in some cases its agreeable reward. Virtue demands for itself no reward; it cannot be bought, not paid; it expects no recompense. It exercises itself without regard to the success of the act; sufficient, that so to act is ordained by the moral law. Virtue is nothing else than the appearance of the acting, sacred spirit of man in its truthfulness. A spirit, without connection with, or without being influenced by, a body working with animal-like intentions and interests, would, if it acted, act only good; it could never act immoral; it would be saint-like, that is, free from defects of morality. Even that our spirit is enveloped in a body, which often works against spiritual law, or nature, strengthens the power of the spirit in the battle. And if it, and it only, acts; if it is not guided by sensual interests, neither from fear of punishment, nor hope of gain, works after its own law, then it is virtuous, that is, free, powerful, self-acting, or spirit as it ought to be, and really worthy of its own dignity.

"'If there lay not the idea of divinity and immortality within it, it would nevertheless be able to act good and virtuously. There are many that believe in God and immortality without being virtuous. There can be such, who, torn by doubts, without faith, are nevertheless virtuous.

"'Virtue and sensual well-being, or what is commonly called happiness, are two separate and distinct things, and the one not existing on account of the other. Through prudence I can increase my well-being, but accidental it is if this happens through virtue. And it continues only so long as virtue may go hand-in-hand with prudence. Yet it is often the case that I must sacrifice all my well-being, because I act virtuously, that is, independent of fear or hope, after the sacred law within me.

"'The virtuous man loves his duty with the same severe, unconquerable zeal as that with which others love their right. He can, like others for their right, joyfully meet certain death for his duty. For duties are the iron, indestructible rights of a moral spirit.

"'So then it has been only weakness and shortsightedness, or prudence, in those who taught that morality and well-being should always be in harmony, and that, because misery only too often follows the footsteps of virtue, in a future life a moral recompense, a harmony of both aims, of this by them so-called highest good, should take place.

"'As the germ, which I drop into the ground, so the human spirit that drops into the universe. As the germ, after the physical laws, in consequence of its organization, sinks roots and thrives, and shoots forth trunk and blossom and leaves, without other aim, but simply because it is so in its proportions, so the spirit of man, when it appears as it is, as it ought to be, after the order lying within itself, morally good and without other aim. There is between the so-called laws of the physical and spiritual world only a difference in name. In reality they are one and the same; the moral law is the natural law of the human spirit, in which it must work, because, as a moral, as a true spirit, it cannot do otherwise.

"'The good done out of fear of God, in hope of recompense, or from fear of future punishment, is only piety, but by no means freedom of the acting spirit, or virtue. Piety, however, breaks the chains of sensuality; prepares, as it were, the freedom of the spirit, leads to virtue, and, in that respect, is venerable as an educational means for nations. It is asking too much, that every man, without fear, without hope, should act good simply for the sake of good; it is asking too much of the child that it, hardly born, should walk without having first gradually exercised its strength; of the spirit, that it should suddenly appear in the splendor of its power, purity, and independence, without preliminary trials.

"'For the training of immature humanity is the doctrin of a final agreement of morality and well-being indispensable; in the same manner as for the savage, the sword of civil justice becomes the means of leading him to lawful behavior.'

"'What!' cried I, astonished, 'all these thousands who courageously, in the hope of a better life, confiding in their recompensing God, bear the suffering of the earth, and willingly sacrifice their own welfare, if it depends upon the fulfilment of duties—how, Alamontada, they were no virtuous people?'"

"'No,' answered the old man, 'they are more prudent thon virtuous, for they sacrifice willingly their small possession, in the expectation to receive in return a larger one. But they are pious people, and approaching their perfection. They are venerable to me; they are dear to me. They need only one more step, and they are perfectly free.

"'You see, dear sir, this is the reason why I spoke in my religion absolutely of no moral obligation, of no virtue, of no judge of the universe. The spirit acts as it must. Its virtue is no pious calculation; it calls to its assistance no secondary intention. It needs for itself no reward; it even cannot be rewarded except it be through the self-consciousnesss of power, of self-will, and freedom, to which it has worked itself up. It counts its most beautiful moments after the triumphs over sensuality.

"'And when we now hav to suffer in consequence of our virtue, dear sir, what, then, is it that suffers? It is not the spirit, for it enjoys just then the victory—only the sensual nature of man suffers. This, therefore, would hav to be rewarded for its self-sacrifice; but how can it become so when the corpse returns to the dust? And, tell me, what in the end means reward, recompense? If I for a life-time carry about with me a sickly body, would I be in a second life rewarded with a healthy one? Had I on that account not borne the pains? Had I not wept the thousand tears of grief?'

"'Friend,' replied I with some shuddering, 'I feel the truth of thy words; but they are hard, they are comfortless. Had not the poor man, oppressed by thousands of troubles, the sweet expectation—thou sufferest not in vain; one day the load is taken away from thee; at last thy misery shall be rewarded with endless blissfulness—alas, friend, he would hav to despair often!'

"'It is true,' answered Alamontada, 'the sensual, immature man, who believes in a recompenser above the stars despairs not. But the more perfect, the spirit-man, despairs still less than he. His body suffers, but not his irreproachable spirit. He knows that, sooner or later, with this body the torment is taken from him. Moreover, dear sir, let us not wander about in dark ideas, but, more distinct, in that of which we speak. We speak of suffering. All suffering is only sensual. The spirit has no other suffering than the consciousness to hav done wrong, that is, to hav conquered in the strife with the low, sensual world.

"'But all suffering is again in itself different. Bodily pains are never lasting, and are on that account endurable, because one knows that death or recovery of the body frees from them. I, consequently, think if we talk of evils that would be too heavy for man, we should not mean thereby bodily diseases. They are always of only short duration, and leave, even while they rage, yet numerous moments of rest.

"'But more bitter are the so-called sufferings of the soul. Of these it is worth the while to speak. I remember no man who on accoont of his bodily disease despaired; but more than one succumbed under grief when he had to leave the lap of wealth and seize the beggar's staff; or when trusted friendship betrayed him; or when he, innocently or guiltily, was exposed to shame and disgrace; or when he lost irreparably a prospect or a happiness on the lastingness of which he had relied.

"'Well, dear sir, whence come these sufferings? They arise from false conception of the value of things, when our low, sensual nature outweighs the spiritual. What are wealth and poverty? Only proportions. The wealthy among the hordes of Indians would be a poor one in European capitals. To become poor means nothing but to hav to deny one's body something to which it is accustomed. He who cannot do this in case of necessity is more animal than spirit; and does he want recompense in a better world for not being an animal? Is poverty an unendurable misfortune? How many a one complains over poverty who is still richer than millions of his fellow-beings! His complaint is more ridiculous and contemptible than deserving of sympathy.

"'Honor and shame; how much do they depend upon circumstance! In virtue alone is honor; in vice alone shame. The virtuous may be indifferent to the opinion of the world. He who has not yet succeeded to find his own worth in quiet fulfilment of his duties and with clear conscience to elevate himself above the fickle opinion of the great mass, is a poor, pitiable creature, more animal than spirit; more child than mature man. He clings in sad blindness more to the changeable play of circumstances than to the eternally true and good.

"As with this so it is with all our so-called sufferings of the soul. Our own weakness causes them, our moral power destroys them. There hav been men who hav thrown away their time to reason away the evils of life, or to defend them, in order, as they claimed, to rescue the honor of their God, or to sweeten them with awakened hope of a better lot on the other side of the grave. But what is all this for? These evils are necessary in the order of the world, and their existence a proof of that for which we are destined. But our destiny is ripeness or perfection of our spirit. It is ripe, it is perfect, when it acts independent of the influence of sensual power, through itself, after its own laws. The evils of humanity drive the spirit to its independence. Therefore is the proverb, Misfortune makes philosphers, a truth too little understood. The fickleness of the earthly calls our attention to the lasting worth of the spiritual. The dust pushes the spirit away from it, and compels it to recognize its own dignity. Man, as he perceives the change of things, scorns to further belong to them, and returns to himself and becomes independent; he learns at last the high wisdom, Man's spirit is for no other end but for itself.

"'The pure feeling of the independence of the spirit is the guarantee for its imperishableness. So it was ordained by the creator of the universe, that man's spirit should be driven back to itself by all things, in order to find in itself and not in others outside, its happiness, its goal, its highness. Were it destined to serve as means for other aims, then it would hav to disappear as soon as these disappear."

Selections.

[From Parton's Life of Voltaire.]

Ecrasez l'Infame.

He had now reached the goal of commonplace aspiration. He possessed in richest abundance what common men covet and rest in. He was grand seigneur, with "two leagues of land" about him, a park three miles in circuit, gardens, châteaux, vassals, a revenue of a hundred thousand francs, a parish church in which he was entitled to be prayed for, some good pictures, a heterogeneous library of five thousand volumes, and a fame the most intense and the widest spread that literature had ever given a man during his life-time. "What will he do with it?" Will he subside now into a benevolent and tranquil country gentleman, a little vain of his peaches? So far from it that he only entered upon the phase of his career which givs him universal importance about the time of his building Ferney. At sixty-five he was yet to do the chief part of the work which will make him interesting to remote posterity.

The French words printed at the head of this chapter, Ecrasez l'Infâme, may be translated, Crush the monster. At the period of his settlement at Ferney, he fell into the habit of ending his more familiar letters with those words, in imitation of the Roman Cato, who finished every speech by saying, "Such is my opinion; I also think that Carthage must be destroyed." At first he used the word fantôme, as when, in 1757, writing to D'Alembert, he concluded thus: "Courage; continue, you and your colleagues [in the Encyclopedia], to overthrow the hideous phantom, enemy of philosophy and persecutor of philosophers." A few days after, in writing to the same stanch friend and ally, he employed the word colosse. "To overthrow the colossus, only five or six philosophers who understand one another are necessary." Then he explained a little what he meant. "The object is not to hinder our lackeys from going to mass or sermon; it is to rescue fathers of families from the tyranny of imposters, and to inspire the spirit of tolerance." Some days after, he again particularizes: "Fanatic papists, fanatic Calvinists, all are tarred with the same brush;" for whose frustration D'Alembert was again exhorted to labor.

As the fight grew hotter and the combatants more numerous, he settled upon Ecrasez l'Infâme as the battle-cry of the faithful. He rang all the changes upon these words. Sometimes he used them in jest; often with passionate vehemence. Not unfrequently, in the haste of finishing his letter, he would abbreviate the words to Ecr. l'Inf., and sometimes he would repeat this abbreviation many times in the same letter. Occasionally he would write, in the only corner left, E. l'I. To show his way of using a phrase which has now become familiar and famous, I will giv a few examples, taken from the endings of letters to such devoted friends of the cause as D'Alembert and Damilaville:

"I want you to crush l'infâme; that is the main point. It is necessary to reduce it to the state in which it is in England; and you can succeed in this if you will. It is the greatest service that can be rendered to the human race."

"Attack, brothers, skilfully, all of you, l'inf. What interests me is the propagation of the faith, of truth, the progress of philosophy, and the abasement of l'inf."

"The Jansenists and the Molinists are tearing one another, and uncovering their shameful wounds; it is necessary to crush one by the other, and make their ruin the steps to the throne of truth. I embrace tenderly the brethren in Lucretius, in Cicero, in Socrates, in Marcus Antoninus, in Julian, and in the communion of all our holy patriarchs."

"Engage all my brethren to pursue l'inf. with voice and pen, without giving a moment's pause. Your impassioned brother, V."

"I am always interested in the success of the French drama, but much more in the brethren, and in the destruction of l'inf., which must never be lost sight of. Valete fratres."

"I end all my letters by saying, Ecr. l'inf., just as Cato always said, 'Such is my opinion, and Carthage must be destroyed.'"

"I embrace my brethren in Confucius, etc. Ah! l'inf.!"

"O my brethren, combat l'inf., even to your last breath. Does the comic opera still sustain the glory of France! Ecr. l'inf."

"I embrace all the brethren. My health is pitiable. Ecr. l'inf."

"I embrace you tenderly, my dear brother. Ecr. l'inf., I tell you."

"I salute all the brethren. Nevertheless, Ecr. l'inf."

"How can you say that l'inf. had no part in the crime of that scoundrel [Damiens]? Read, then, his reply: 'It was religion that made me do what I hav done.' This is what he said in his examination. I am only his clerk. My dear brother, I hate all tyranny."

"The older I grow, the more implacable enemy I become of l'infâme. Adieu. Shall I not see you before I die? Ecr. l'inf."

"My tender benediction to all the brethren. Orate, fratres, et vigilate. Ecr. l'inf."

"Drink to my health with brother Plato [Diderot], and Ecr. l'inf."

"Vive felix! écr. l'inf. We will crush it; we will crush it."

"Ecr. l'inf., my dear brother, écr. l'inf.; and say to brother Protagoras [D'Alembert] écr. l'inf. in the morning, and écr. l'inf. in the evening."

"Oh, if the faithful had the warmth of your noble soul, how much good they would do! Oh, the lovely musical chimes that should end with Ecrasez l'infâme!" [To Damilaville, in 1765.]

A very long list of similar utterances could be given, but these will suffice. What, then, was that Infamous Thing, which he was so passionately desirous of crushing? And why this excess of zeal, in the decline of his life, when he was panoplied about from dangerous attack by a splendor of reputation and princely opulence never before enjoyed, still less won, by a poet? This question is one which demands an explicit answer. The Infâme of Voltaire was not religion, nor the Christian religion, nor the Roman Catholic church. It was religion claiming supernatural authority, and enforcing that claim by pains and penalties. That is the fairest answer to the question, taking his whole life into view. The access of zeal which he experienced at the time now under consideration was due to particular causes. Thirty years before, as the reader may remember, when Hérault said to him, "You will not destroy the Christian religion," he replied, "We shall see." It is Voltaire himself who preserves this anecdote.*

But who was Hérault, and what had he to do with it? Hérault was lieutenant-general of the French police, through whom French priests put people into dungeons, broke them on the wheel, and burnt them at the stake.

The Infâme which Voltaire had in his mind when he wrote Ecr. l'inf., mon cher frère, écr. l'inf., et dites à frère Protagoras, écr. l'inf. le matin, et écr. l'inf. le soir, was religion claiming supernatural authority, and employing to enforce the claim the power, and resources of a governmen. It was the most ancient and powerful of all alliances, that of the Medicin-Man and the Chief, with modern means and appliances to assist both. It was religion with the Bastille and the rack at its command. It was religion owning two acres of every five in France (usually the best two), and able to expel from the other three the noblest Frenchmen who called in question its tenets. It was religion smoothing the upward path of servil mediocrity, and making it impracticable to honest merit. It was religion which could put an ugly tall pot upon the head of a clown, a crooked stick in his hand, cover him all over with tawdry raiment, endow him with an imposing title and a prince's revenue, and then sit him down, squat like a toad, upon the intellect of France. It was religion making an Ass of Mirepoix the censor of a Newton in Newton's own subjects. It was religion keeping an ear always open to receive from women secrets not told to parent or husband. It was religion the mania of the weak, the cloak of the false, the weapon of the cruel. It was religion killing religion, and making virtue itself contemptible by resting its claim on grounds untenable and ridiculous. It was religion wielding the whole mass of ignorance, indolence, and cowardice, and placing it solid and entire in the only path by which the human race could advance. It was the worst thing that ever was in the world. It was L'INFAME!

*Voltaire to D'Alembert, June 20, 1760.

Voltaire was mistaken in supposing that l'Infâme had no existence in Protestant England. If we look into the early lives of British men noted for their hostility to it, such as Hume, Gibbon, Shelley, Dickens, and Hood, we usually find that they suffered from it acutely in childhood or youth, as Voltaire doubtless did from the craven austerity of his elder brother, Armand, as well as from his early acquaintance with M. Hérault. The case of Thomas Hood is one in point. The most careless reader of his works must hav observed that he loathed the British form of l'Infâme with something like Voltaire's sustained intensity, and never lost a chance to giv it a lunge with his rapier. At the end of one of his later letters we hav the secret. An awful widow having long pestered him with her insolent tracts and impious admonitions, he at length turned upon her, and wrote her a letter—his Tract, as he styled it—in which, perhaps, he used language somewhat too violent. He seems to hav thought so himself, and concluded his performance with an apology:

"And now, madam, farewell. Your mode of recalling yourself to my memory reminds me that your fanatical mother insulted mine in the last days of her life (which was marked by every Christian virtue) by the presentation of a tract addressed to Infidels. I remember also that the same heartless woman intruded herself, with less reverence than a Mohawk squaw would hav exhibited, on the chamber of death, and interrupted with her jargon almost my very last interview with my dying parent. Such reminiscences warrant some severity; but if more be wanting, know that my poor sister has been excited by a circle of canters like yourself into a religious frenzy, and is at this moment in a private mad-house."

It was this spirit—giv it what name you will—that Voltaire abhorred with a detestation so intense. In France, in his day, that spirit had blank lettres de cachet in its secret portfolio, and the French police to serve them. Let me remark, also, that, like Hood, he set limits to his dissent, and adhered to his belief in a superintending deity. Some of his ablest and best allies were Atheists. He had a short and easy way with them. "Gentlemen," he would say, taking out his watch, "the watch proves a watchmaker." Baron de Gleichen, who visited him in 1757, relates that a young author, at his wits' end for the means of living, knocked one day at the poet's door, and to recommend himself said, "I am an apprentice Atheist [garçon athée], at your service." Voltaire replied, "I hav the honor to be a master Deist; but, although our trades are opposed, I will giv you some supper to-night and some work to-morrow. I wish to avail myself of your arms, and not of your head."

He evidently felt at times the staggering difficulty of reconciling obvious facts—as, for example, the existence of so much innocent and profitless suffering in the world—with the simple theory of the universe that has come down to us from the childhood of our race. But any other theory then current seemed to him still less tenable; and he thought the idea of a Supreme Being "necessary" both to philosophy and to morals. Atheism, however, he deemed a slight and curable malady, compared with that unutterable thing which caused the massacres of St. Bartholomew and kept France in a bloody broil for a century.

"The Atheist [he once wrote] is a monster that will devour only to appease his hunger. Superstition is another monster, which will rend men for conscience' sake. I hav always remarked that an Atheist can be cured; but you can never cure radically the superstitious man. The Atheist is a man of understanding, who is mistaken, but who thinks for himself; the superstitious man is brutally stupid, who has never had any ideas of his own. The Atheist will violate Iphigenia about to espouse Achilles; but the fanatic will piously slay her upon the altar, and believe that Jupiter will be much indebted to him for the act. The Atheist will steal a golden vessel from a church in order to giv a supper to his loose companions; but the fanatic will celebrate an auto-da-fé in that church, and sing a Jewish canticle with full throat while burning Jews at the stake. Yes, my friends, Atheism and fanaticism are the two poles of a universe of confusion and horror. The narrow zone of virtue is between those two poles. March with a firm step in that path; believe in a good God and be good."

Such remained his conviction as long as he lived. Without ever being in the least "devout," he had the feeling always which he once expressed so neatly, "If there were no God, it would be necessary to invent him."

It remains now to indicate, with all possible brevity, the events which inflamed anew the zeal of Voltaire against l'Infâme and caused him to reconsecrate his life to a systematic endeavor to crush it.

Annual Membership.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: One of the most practical and efficient means of advancing the cause of rationalism is for every Freethinker to become an annual member of the National Liberal League. This is a feature of organization capitally adapted to meet the requirements of Radicals who reside in isolated sections of the country, or who are too much engrossed with business affairs to find the leisure time, whose love of retirement, dislike of notoriety, or any other causes, may prevent their taking an activ part in the organization of local associations.

Every zealous Liberal in the land should join the League, and thus form a "reserve corps" to supply the "sinews of war," which placed in the hands of our untiring secretary, who never sleeps, would enable him to accomplish marvelously grand results in keeping the watch-fires brilliantly burning and permeating with the gospel of the new dispensation even the remotest sections of our liberty-loving country.

The annual membership certificate is tastefully prepared, has attached a golden seal, and every possessor should take pride in handing it down to posterity as a memento of the advanced position he occupied in the van of freedom's hosts during "the times that tried men's souls" and reputations.

The trifling sum of one dollar remitted to T. C. Leland, 201 East 71st street, New York, will secure the jewel of a document, a niche in futurity's temple of fame, and your name on the eternal roll of honor. Yours, J. FRANCIS RUGGLES.

The Political Aspect.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It has been said of old, and it applies equally well to the present, that "To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven." The time is coming, and now is, when the Liberals of our country of all shades of opinion should unite for the purpose of maintaining a political power. Heretofore there has not been the same facilities offered for this purpose as now. The movement two years ago which resulted in a convention at Cincinnati was rather premature; the people at that time were more wrapped up in the old parties, they were reticent about coming out in favor of anything new. At present there is no occasion for mistrust, the political parties of our country are virtually dead. The Democracy has died of a broken heart.

The Republican party has outgrown its breeches, and its great end and aim is to retain the power it now holds. It has become corrupted by politicians who hav nothing in view but to organize a tyrannical system of government whereby the rights of majorities may be disregarded and a dominant power exerted in favor of monopolies, corporations, and capitalists.

The Greenbackers hav nothing of which to complain now, inasmuch as there is money enough for all who are industrious, and the means of acquiring it are ample. The kind of currency is a matter of little import; the money we hav is good, and people are satisfied generally if they only hav enough of it; so that, in reality, there are no good reasons why this party should be supported, particularly so, as there are now in the political arena three different parties, all of which present shortcomings of the real needs of the present. The choice of these has been in favor of Republicanism, since this seems more progressiv in its nature and tendencies, having carried the feather of antislavery in its cap. Its record is the only thing of which it can boast, and the days of its usefulness are almost over. It has nothing noble to achieve. Democracy and Greenbackism represent lost causes. We need advancement. The people are restless. The time is ripe for a new party of broad principles. Many are becoming disgusted with the present state of political affairs, and they are ready and willing to support a new party that will offer anything better than that which now exists. Two years, at this day and age of the world, in which the facilities for the dissemination of knowledge are so complete, are quite sufficient for working a change in the public mind, and developing a sentiment in the direction of progress.

No doubt there are many (like the writer) who do not take enough interest in politics to even vote at all, who would take a live interest in a movement on the part of Liberals to advocate principles that we are badly in need of. We want universal suffrage, equal rights, and impartial liberty. It is not just that there should be taxation without representation as is the case with the women of our country. It is not fair that rationalists should be compelled to support (through exemption of taxation) the gospel mills of superstition, to contribute through direct taxation to the maintenance of a worthless set of celestial aristocrats called chaplains, or to be debarred from any right or privilege that is vouchsafed to us by the Constitution of the United States. There is no higher duty open to Liberals now (no matter to what party they may hav heretofore belonged) than to unite in one common interest in the vindication of their just rights. It is to be hoped that this will be brought about soon. Surely many are ready. The only way we may acquire strength is by union, therefore, we need organization. Let the old parties go, they hav no good thing to commend them. There is room to erect a platform broad enough to hold all humanity. Every plank should be a principle grand enough to be universal and impartial, and protect natural and inalienable rights of all. R. H. LAMB.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1881.

A Sad and Shameful Deed.

That a second president of this republic should be shot down by the hand of an assassin within the short space of sixteen years is indeed a most sad and unfortunate affair. Even if the president's life is no more valuable than that of any other man, and although he may hav defects of character such as are not to be found in other men, still he, as the chief ruler of the country, is a most important personage in the eyes of the world, and to the fifty millions composing the American nation it is a terrible calamity to hav him taken off in this unceremonious and shocking manner.

Although some partisan papers hav shamefully given hints that the assassination was perpetrated in the interest of the faction of a party which wishes to come into power, and thus rise upon the dead form of a departing chief magistrate, it must be remembered that there are not the slightest grounds for any such insinuations, and that no party or persons are responsible for the rash conduct of the reckless, worthless, and partially insane person who took it upon himself to perform the bloody deed.

He appears not so much a partisan or politician as a fanatic and zealot. He givs it out that he is a theologian, a religious teacher, and a prophet. He is the author of an intensely religious work upon the coming of Christ, and has also spoken in public upon the same subject, in defense of orthodoxy as against Ingersollism and Infidelity. He is a witness in defense of divine inspiration. He also seems to hav been connected with the Young Men's Christian Association, and he has devised a plan by which to evangelize and convert the whole world in a very expeditious manner.

He seems to hav been infatuated with an idea that in striking down the president a sacrifice would be offered that would be most acceptable to the deity whose throne is above the clouds, as really as Abraham imagined he was pleasing the God of his family and people by offering up his own beloved son.

These religious zealots and fanatics hav done a vast amount of harm in the world, and it is desirable that their rule and influence may rapidly grow less.

Millions of the people of this country are intently watching the result of this mad act, and praying that the life of the president may be spared.

A consoling reflection is that, while the deed is an appalling one, it will not demoralize the country, and the business of the government and of the country will go right on as though nothing unusual had occurred. Indeed, what now seems the greatest evil that could hav befallen the country may prove even a blessing in disguise.

To Be Illustrated.

In compliance with the wishes of many friends regarding our proposed volumes descriptiv of what we see in our tour around the world, we hav decided to incur the additional expense of having them generously illustrated. Some one hundred and fifty full page illustrations descriptiv of the most important scenes on the journey will be included in the volume, besides smaller cuts of varying sizes. These will add not a little to the interest of the work, and it is believed that the patronage will be increased in proportion to the increased expense. If there are others who feel disposed to bespeak the work, and to add their names to the honorable galaxy which shines so brightly, we will acknowledge the accession with all cheerfulness, and we will be glad to send them the volumes as soon as ready. Even as the laborers who came late to the vineyard were paid with the same generosity as those who came at an earlier hour, so those who join this goodly number at this late hour will be just as gladly received and will be entitled to the same gratitude and the same remuneration.

Vetoing the Anti-Spy Bill.

In keeping with our fears and apprehensions, Governor Cornell refused to sign the bill disapproving of the contemptible spy and espionage system, well known as Comstockism. In this he has failed to meet the wishes of a large number of earnest, honest, well-disposed people who hav become heartily sick and disgusted with the miserable and abhorrent policy of inducing and decoying persons to commit offenses or crimes that they would not otherwise hav thought of engaging in, as Comstock has done over and over again. Yes, the Governor has made a large class of people sorrowful by the course he has seen fit to pursue, though possibly he has pleased the intolerant religious class, to whom he has undoubtedly listened, and whose influence he has shown a disposition to secure.

It is very doubtful if he has acted wisely in the course he has taken with Col. Murphy's Anti-Spy bill, which, after a thorough and prolonged examination and debate, passed both branches of the Legislature by large majorities, so anxious are the people and their representativs to see the obnoxious Comstock and his decoy system no longer form a part of our criminal practice and to be a leading feature in our courts of justice. While thousands of wise and intelligent people wish to see this infamous system no longer disgracing our courts, we are left to infer that the governor is in favor of deceit, subterfuge, and lies being employed to induce unsuspecting persons to commit offenses, technical or otherwise, and then the contemptible sneak who has performed this dirty work to hav the ability to go into court, and, with his interested and often perjured testimony, to send the thoughtless person to prison and to disgrace him for life. According to our governor's conduct, this is his idea of justice, and this is his approved mode for suppressing vice and crime. But in truth such a villainous course is a thousand times more culpable than a large share of the offenses thus procured to be committed.

Let it be remembered, all right-minded, Liberal people, that Gov. A. B. Cornell is in favor of the false spy system, and that he approves Comstock, falsehood, and perjury. Let this not be forgotten of him when he again presents himself before the people for an office.

The following very just remarks are from the New York Evening Express:

Most of Governor Cornell's vetoes hav been wise; but his veto of the Murphy bill to put a stop to the use of spies and informers to entice people into crime for the sake of punishing them, was unwise. The bill was framed to stop a species of crime which is in flagrant violation of the spirit of our institutions and laws. It was intended to put a stop to the systematic work of tempting innocent people to commit acts they would not otherwise be guilty of in order to punish them. This is the essence and peculiarity of Comstockism. It is his favorit method of entrapping the unwary. It givs him and his agents plenty of business, and enables him to exhibit himself every little while in the character of a great moral scavenger. Instead of doing good that more good may come, he does evil that more evil may be done, and that the doer of it may suffer. This method is so abhorrent to all our ideas of right and propriety that it is hard to believe any man calling himself respectable can act upon it. The bill putting a stop to this iniquitous spy system passed both houses by large majorities. It was approved by the press of the state of both parties. The people had demanded it, and were glad of its passage. The governor has certainly shown less than his usual good sense in vetoing it. It is amazing that, under the circumstances, the bill was not instantly passed over the veto. But the cringing Republicans who had voted for its passage dared not oppose the will of the governor, whose signature they want to bills of their own. Another year of unmitigated Comstock.

Truth makes these remarks upon the same subject:

Governor Cornell has put his veto upon several acts of the present legislature which were so pernicious that his action in regard to them has earned him the respect of many citizens who, justly or unjustly, were not disposed to giv him credit for the best motivs in the world in his official acts.

But he seems to hav fallen so into the habit of vetoing bills that he has lost the power to distinguish between a good one and a bad one.

He appears to hav been afflicted in this manner when he came to consider Col. Murphy's Anti-Spy bill. Or, possibly, he had fallen so completely under the influence of Anthony Comstock and other gentlemen like him, who make a living by following the occupation of private spies, that he lost all power of clearly discerning the good from the bad in legislativ measures.

Since the bill has been defeated by the action of the Governor, it is proper that the people should again be reminded of its provisions, not one of which is in the slightest degree objectionable, except to men who make a living by tempting others into crime and then informing of them.

The bill provided that no one who laid a trap for another to lead him into the commission of a crime should be permitted to testify in the case.

It might be objected to this that there are some offenses so secret in their nature that they may be committed repeatedly with impunity, unless a case is made against them by decoy or other prearranged plan.

But the bill fully met this objection, for it further provided that the preceding clause should not be of force in cases where the decoy was expressly authorized by the district attorney.

The effect of such a bill would hav been to prevent the wholesale unauthorized schemes of men like Comstock to inveigle others into the commission of crimes of which they would never hav dreamed but for such efforts, while it would not hav precluded the discovery, exposure, and punishment of secret crimes by officers selected and authorized by the public prosecutor.

What the governor could find objectionable in this bill it is difficult to conceive, beyond the fact that it would hav left Anthony Comstock without a very disreputable occupation.

Probably that reason was enough for the governor.

Parton's Life of Voltaire.

II.—"L'INFAME" AND THE ENCYCLOPEDIA.

The Bastille, "The Infamous," and the Pantheon mark the beginning, middle, and end of Voltaire's career. He graduated from the Bastille a rebel. He was exiled to England and served his apprenticeship to liberty there under the Common Law, a free press, trial by jury, and the Philosophy of Bolingbroke. Among the more charming parts of Mr. Parton's narrativ we cannot but linger over his story of Voltaire's three years' residence and many friends in England. It is but a side scene, it is true, but it opens a view into English life, thought, manners, and letters that surprises by the freshness of its description and its contrast with the France that Voltaire had left. This contrast was not lost upon the vivacious author whose heart was swollen by the sense of injustice. He mastered the language, literature, manners, and even the people of England as no foreigner had ever before done. When he returned to France in 1729 he took with him an English education that was to a great degree the foundation and inspiration of his future life.

The question for him was, What shall that life be? What could he accomplish? To determin that, he knew that he must first become a somebody. He was by nature and profession a man of letters, a dramatist. He must win fame, honor, wealth, lands, and a position in the social and political order of his country which would be practically indestructible.

He would do this against the most disheartening opposition. He did it; he won! "For forty years," he afterward wrote to D'Alembert, "I hav carried on the wretched trade of man of letters, and for forty years I hav been overwhelmed with enemies. I could make a library of the abuse which has been vomited against me, and the calumnies which hav been poured out with lavish hand. I was alone, without a single partisan, without any support, and delivered over to the beasts, like an early Christian. It was thus that I passed my life at Paris." The wonderful story of these forty years we cannot even refer to. Is it not told as none other ever could tell it in Mr. Parton's pages?

In our second extract which we giv in another column the scene opens at the close of these forty years. It is pleasant indeed to contemplate the victor settled in triumph at Ferney in his sixty-fifth year. The goal of common ambition he had reached. But for what? To give twenty years more of the hardest and most dangerous toil of body and mind to the emancipation of his fellow-beings from what he condensed into one word, "L'INFAME"—THE INFAMOUS—that is, the Christian Superstition that lay like a nightmare across the human soul. "It is the greatest service that can be rendered to the human race," he said. He seemed better adapted to render it than any other, and he enlisted for the war, or for all that remained of his life. To succeed at all he must gather about him the freest, the most able, and learned spirits of France and strike squarely at the Christian Hierarchy. For that was the citidel of all despotism, tyranny, injustice, and wrong, and it was founded upon human ignorance, fear, and credulity. His life was to be henceforth a continuous warfare against the power of the darkness wielding the resources of a kingdom, and backed by the "vicegerent of God."

The revolt of Luther was but temporary, partial, and local in comparison to it. Voltaire brought on the most tremendous mental, moral, and political conflict of modern history. The falling Bastille, the French Revolution, the Napoleon dynasty, and the Republic of to-day are only successiv parts of it. Indeed the smoke of the battle has only now so far cleared away that Mr. Parton has been able to giv us the first clear and intelligible account of the opening of the contest, and of the genius and services of its first and greatest leader. Voltaire opened by bringing to bear upon this consolidated iniquity called THE INFAMOUS the three great departments of human nature—each of which should be carefully considered:

1. The intellect, that is, the profoundest learning and ability, represented by the Encyclopedia.

2. The heart, moved by the most cutting wit or genial humor that mortal ever used to inflict or to heal a wound.

3. The purest humanity that finally made torture and persecution hideous and loathsome and opened up the hope for the freedom and equal laws of a republic.

The first and fundamental position was the free use of the intellect and its resulting fruits. That was substantially won in the bitter fight with "The Infamous" over the Encyclopedia. The Jesuits had the control of the government, of education, and of the censorship of the press. From the first they had a natural horror of the new project of an Encyclopedia, which should be an orderly statement of all of human learning, art, industry, and the progress of Man on earth.

This famous enterprise was projected in 1570 by the brotherhood of Scientists and Philosophers, of which Voltaire was easily the chief. We hav only to recall the names of the principal colleagues, such as Diderot, D'Alembert, Turgot, Montesquieu, Condorcet, Haller, Holbach, Rousseau, Marmontel, to perceive that "The Infamous" had met a new, and, to it, a terrible array of human intelligence.

The contest was long and varying. The censorship did what it could to crush the printers and editors and to emasculate the work before its successiv volumes were published, and the hangman and his fire were called in to suppress it afterward. It took about twenty years to get its twenty volumes into the world in a mutilated and confused form which shows plainly the terrible ordeal it had passed.

It is difficult for us to conceive the importance of that work to the darkened Europe of that age. It was the light of science and human worth taking the place of supernaturalism. It was not so much its direct attacks upon the church and "religion" that made it so hateful, but the contrast of the whole of modern civilization, which cast into the background, as if insignificant, the great questions of theology for which men had been for ages past slaughtered in wars or at the stake. The real questions of interest of this world were presented by the great men of the world as it was, and they made the world of the middle ages appear as a hideous nightmare.

That work, too, had another important aspect; it was the beginning of the formulation of the sciences into a creed that should be really true, useful, and verifiable. In a word, it was the precursor of the POSITIV PHILOSOPHY, which is really the only substitute and antidote for theology. This is apparent enough from the introduction to the first volume, in which D'Alembert undertakes an able and systematic ordering of the sciences, bringing each up to date, with a general statement of their methods and results, thus suggesting to Comte the work he completed a hundred years later.

This great work would never hav been completed without Voltaire. We can never be too grateful for his leadership in this contest. The editors were persecuted to despair, and their labors stopped. Take this page from Mr. Parton:

"Sensitiv D'Alembert, never a robust man, was the first to giv up. He wrote to Voltaire, Jan. 11, 1758:

"'I know not if the Encyclopedia will be continued. What is certain is it will not be continued by me. I hav notified M. de Malesherbes [minister] and the publishers that they must seek my successor. I am worn out with the affronts and vexations of every kind which this work has drawn upon us. The odious and even infamous satires which are published against it, and which are not only tolerated, but protected, authorized, applauded, nay, commanded, by those who hav authority in their hands, . . . all these reasons, joined to several others, oblige me to renounce forever that accursed work.'"

Take this specimen of Voltaire's replies to such letters:

"This grand work of the Encyclopedia, in which the nation ought to be interested, is yours in common with a dozen superior men, who ought to make common cause with you. Why do you not address yourselvs in a body to M. de Malesherbes? Why do you not prescribe the conditions on which you will continue? There it need of your work; it has become necessary. . . . Bestir yourselvs, and you wil lbe the masters. I talk to you like a republican; but also the matter concerns the republic of letters. Oh, poor republic!"

"To this letter the too susceptible D'Alembert replied at much length, in a strain of mingled pathos and indignation. "I doubt," he concluded, "if your article upon History can pass with the new censors. But nothing presses; I doubt if the eighth volume is ever printed. Think of the crowd of articles which it is now impossible to write: Heresy, Hierarchy, Indulgence, Infallibility, Immortality, Immaterial, Hebrews, Hobbism, Jesus Christ, Jesuits, Inquisition, Jansenists, Intolerance, and so many others. Again I say, we must stop where we are."

"The editor may naturally enough hav doubted whether the article upon History would pass. The first page contained a Voltairean definition of Sacred History, which a French censor of that time would hav first enjoyed and then erased: 'Sacred History is a series of operations, divine and miraculous, by which it pleased God formerly to conduct the Jewish nation, and to-day to exercise our faith.'

"D'Alembert withdrew, and Diderot struggled on alone."

Yes, but not quite alone, for Voltaire was ever ready with his articles or advice, and his protectiv, all-powerful influence. It was in vain that his friends, from Madam Denis, his niece and housekeeper, to Frederick the Great, protested against his becoming absorbed in this conflict with the Infamous. He determined that the fangs of this monster should be drawn, and that the Encyclopedia should be continued and completed. He succeeded; but only by an iron will that otherwise contrasts strangely with the vivacity and versatility of his genius.

We read again:

"Madam Denis found him unmanageable from 1759. A few days after the news reached their retreat of the solemn burning of 'De Esprit' and the 'Loi Naturelle,' she wrote to one of her friends:

'My uncle is always at work. He does a hundred different things at once. His genius retains its vigor. A certain letter has appeared in the Mercury, which I should so much hav wished him to suppress. I can no longer do anything in that way. I am so convinced of this that very often I avoid reading his manuscripts. Age has given him an invincible obstinacy, against which it is impossible to struggle; it is the only mark of old age that I perceive in him. Be sure, therefore, when you see things which he had better not hav written that I groan over them without being able to prevent their appearance. If I were not sensitiv I should be very happy. He is very kind to me, provided I avoid making the least objection to anything that he does. This is the course which I hav adopted, and I find it answers very well.' [Sensible woman!]

"The king of Prussia, also, from the midst of his armies, observed the renewed zeal of his old master, and wrote of it as men of the world usually do of such things. The following was a famous passage in its day, and is still quoted:

'Your zeal burns against the Jesuits and the superstitions. You do well to combat error; but do you believe that the world will change? The human mind is weak; more than three-fourths of mankind are formed to be the slaves of the absurdest fanaticism. The fear of the devil and of hell is fascinating to them, and they detest the sage who wishes to enlighten them. The mass of our species is stupid [sot] and wicked. I look in vain among them for that image of God of which the theologians assure us they carry the imprint. Every man has a wild beast within him. Few know how to enchain him. Most men let loose the rein when the terror of the laws does not restrain them.'

"Madam du Deffand often wrote in a similar strain."

Nothing could move him from his purpose. His resolve gave him a revival of health and spirits. He had found something to liv for beyond himself, and that ennobled him.

Not only was the Encyclopedia continued, but the matter that was too rich, wicked, and witty to appear in it fell together under his hands as the still more famous "Philosophical Dictionary"—a kind of heretical supplement to the greater work. By the most wonderful dexterity, and duplicity too, this work, which would hav brought torture and death upon any one responsible for it, was printed and circulated right under the noses of the Jesuit censors. Such results made utter folly of the attempts to crib and confine the growing mind of Europe. The first, the great intellectual victory, was won. The systematized learning and free thought of Man was before the world, and it could not help but be a different and a better world ever after. The declaration of independence of the mind of man was actually out, and it could never be withdrawn. The Jesuits and The Infamous were slow to perceive and realize their defeat. Very much was still in their hands. The tutorship of the young king, the education of women and children, they could still hold. They seated themselvs upon the safety valve of the nation, determined to repress, without the slightest thought that the result must be an explosion. "After us the deluge," said the wiser Madame Pompadour. How Voltaire, by his matchless, inimitable WIT, unseated The Infamous for a time and delayed the dread catastrophe, until there was an educated mass of French people somewhat able to meet the great emergency, must remain as our next subject.

Obituary.

"How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank."
—Shakspere.

Charles Brigham, aged twelve years, youngest son of Addison M. and Jane Kerr Brigham, of Le Roy, Bradford Co., Pa., passed from earthly scenes on April 27, 1881, after a severe illness of several weeks. He was a very intelligent and activ boy, intellectually and physically, fond of books, and much beloved by his companions. His father being an earnest and activ Freethinker, sparing no pains to spread his TRUTH SEEKERS and Liberal books among the people, and believing that all churches, clergymen, and the Bible are a detriment instead of a good in society, he dispensed entirely with them, as well as the idle and superstitious ceremonies which they enjoin, and which are so often an outrage upon all justice, common sense, and the finer feelings and instincts of human nature.

At the grave the writer of this article made a few remarks and read a brief service from the "Truth Seeker Collection" and the following stanzas from Sir E. Bulwer Lytton's poem, "There Is No Death."

There is no death! The dust we tread
Shall change beneath the summer showers
To golden grains of mellow fruit,
Or rainbow-tinted flowers.

The granit rocks disorganize
To feed the hungry rocks they bear;
The forest leaves drink daily life
From out the viewless air.

There is no death! The leaves may fall,
The flowers may fade and pass away;
They only wait through wintry hours
The coming of the May.

It was the first Infidel funeral ever held in the town, and as there was a full attendance of church people it created much comment and misrepresentation from them. Thought and discussion, however, were brought about thereby, and we hope it has opened the way for others in the future, on like occasions, to dispense with the senseless prayers and gloomy hymns that our Christian friends seem to hug to their bosoms with a tenacity worthy of a better cause.

Death is not an enemy. It is in accordance with natural law, and only the ignorant fear it.

New Leagues, Annual Members, and Contributions.

The auxiliary Leagues, since last report, hav increased four, and withdrawn one, as follows: 45. Oxford, Nebraska, Dr. E. E. Guild, Secretary; 217. Central City, Dakota, A. R. Fowler, Sec.; 218. Jackson county, Iowa, Wm. G. Stuart, Sec.; 219. Ossian, Iowa, James Daniels, Sec.

At this late day, when Comstockism is going into disgrace everywhere else, the auxiliary League at Moberly, Missouri, severs its connection with the National Liberal League and returns its charter. The cause assigned is the action of the League Congress at Chicago last September. Its place is promptly filled by the newly-formed League at Oxford, Nebraska.

We regret that Moberly seems not to be in communication with the rest of the world, and knows not what is going on. In six more months Moberly will wake up to the fact that its friend Comstock is altogether wiped out, and that it has no obscene agent left to swear by. However, Leagues may come and Leagues may go, but the National Liberal League goes on forever.

The Annual Membership has increased to ninety, as follows:

Henry E. Hunter, Hinsdale, N. H.; S. S. Ball, Penn Yan, N. Y.; Pulaski Carter, Providence, Pa., John Bulmer, Wm. Ellison, and Wm. A. Thompson, St. John, Ill.; Alfred Taylor, Gardner, Kan.; Dennis Barnes, Charles Rattenbacker, Henry Strobin, A. J. Johnson, Wm. Sarginson, and Maria L. Follett, all of Le Claire, Iowa; Abbie and Amos Knapp, Dowagiac, Mich.; Jerome Dutton, Wheatland, Iowa; H. Steinmetz, Raleigh, N. C.; Geo. Collins and J. C. Shannon, Santa Clara, Cal.; Geo. Lynn, Lockport, Ill.

Aside from receipts for charter fees, memberships, and the Man, contributions hav been light—only $2.00 from Jerome Dutton, Wheatland, Iowa; $5.00 from our ever-reliable friend here in New York, Daniel M. Ryan; and $10 from our biographer, historian, and friend, James Parton, Newburyport, Mass.

T. C. LELAND, Sec. N. L. L.

The National Liberal League Secretary, having to attend the Annual Congress in September, will leave New York early, say about August 15th, and saunter his way leisurely toward the West, stopping with friends, looking in on Leagues, attending conventious, etc. He does not set himself up as a champion speaker, but he has been known to read an occasional essay to an appreciativ audience with acceptation and effect. If any Leagues or Liberals along his line of travel would like to see or hear him, he will be happy to accept a few invitations.

Open Letter.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper being one of the Western Light exchanges, it givs me the unpleasant duty to inform you of its suspension for a brief season. Owing to my exhausted mental and physical condition by too much care, I am obliged to rest from all labor and recuperate through the summer months. I hope to renew acquaintance in the fall with those from whom I hav received a kind word and encouraging aid, for the Light was becoming influential through its able contributors. I am glad that so many progressiv papers are enabled to keep their devoted heads above water, and the Western Light belonging exclusivly to myself by virtue of its copyright, will wait for its proprietor to set it again on a hill to "shine for all." Now it is hid under a bushel, and as the "revised" did not exclude the text of admonition, it accepts the passage of scripture and may appear again with greater brilliancy should the fates otherwise decree. St. Louis may not be found wanting her quota of Spiritual Liberal volunteers, both from the male and female ranks, that will do credit to the new dispensation.

Publicly thanking friends, I still remain their loyal champion in all progressiv work,

ANNIE T. ANDERSON.

Anti-Monopoly Resolutions.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT A MEETING OF THE NATIONAL ANTI-MONOPOLY LEAGUE.

Resolved, That the confirmation of Hon. Stanley Matthews, the Pacific Railroad candidate, as a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, is a signal and alarming proof of the purpose and the power of corporate monopolies; and their purpose to pack the Supreme Court with judges who will reverse its decision in the Granger cases, affirming the right of the people through their legislatures to control corporations; of their power to secure the confirmation of their candidate in defiance of the popular will manifested through the press, and against an almost unanimous report of the statesmen and lawyers of both parties, constituting the Senate Committee on the judiciary.

Resolved, That we view with apprehension the power of monopolies in the legislativ, judicial, and executiv departments of our government; that the recent prominent part taken by the railroads in electing candidates for the Senate of the United States, and the nomination to positions of power and influence of Mr. Matthews, the railroad advocate in the United States Senate; Mr. Elliott F. Shepard, the son-in-law of Mr. Vanderbilt; and Hon. Wm. H. Robertson, the life-long attorney of the same interest, and who but recently was instrumental in killing the bill to prevent telegraph monopoly—all point to a settled policy on the part of the monopoly interest to push their creatures into power.

Resolved, That the tendency is very marked to monopolize the enormous advantages of steam and electricity, and use them as a means to tax the public unduly for their use; that the concentration of vast wealth in few hands while the many are kept poor is opposed to public policy, to public morals, and endangers the permanency of our form of government.

Resolved, That we especially view with alarm the attempts of monopolists to control our courts and the press, which, with our schools, are the chief bulwarks of our free institutions; that we therefore deprecate such appointments as those above mentioned, and earnestly affirm that it is the duty of all good citizens to hold all persons and all parties to a strict accountability for thus betraying the public interest.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Twentieth Letter.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I very cheerfully admit, as I have admitted before, that many ancient teachers before Christ taught sublime truths and excellent morals. In fact, I have no objection to conceding that a code of morals, considered simply as an ethical code, cannot be a proof of revelation, for it can exist apart from it. Christ's mission was not primarily that of a moral teacher; he came to die for the salvation of his own. But the point I insist upon is that the morality of the New Testament, as a whole body of ethics, is infinitely superior to any code of morality found in any other book. I ask where Christ obtained such wisdom? Was he in reality a man of great erudition masquerading in the garb of an illiterate peasant? Or was he an imaginary being, in whose mythical person was concentrated the wisdom and morality of the ages? Who could imagine such a character? Not the early Christians; their writings that remain prove their incapacity; not the Jews, with their clannishness and hatred of him. It is these indirect considerations, so unique and extraordinary, that, taken into consideration with other proofs, confirm the conviction to every mind whose view is not merely superficial, of the divine origin of the Bible.

I do not think that any benefit can be derived from my elaborating this view into its details with you, nor would it profit any reader who is in sympathy with your views of the morality of the Bible. The confirmation it would add depends largely upon the disposition and bias of the investigator. Not a few unbelievers consider the Bible contains the sublimest system of morality ever inculcated, and pay homage to the person of Christ as being the ideal of human perfection. The Infidel Rousseau is one prominent example. In a chapter which I cannot resist the temptation of quoting in full he acknowledges all I claim as to the character and morality of Christ. In his "Emile," book four, he writes: "I avow to you also that the holiness of the gospel is an argument that speaks to my heart and to which I should even regret to find any good reply. See the books of philosophers, with all their pomp, how little they are beside this! Can a book at once so sublime and simple be the work of men? Is it possible that he whose history it is can be a man himself? Is this the tone of an enthusiast or an ambitious sectary? What sweetness, what purity, in his manners! What touching grace in his instructions! What elevation in his maxims! What profound wisdom in his discourses! What presence of mind! What delicacy and what justness in his replies! What empire over his passions! Where is the man, where is the sage, who knows to act, to suffer, and to die without weakness and without ostentation? When Plato paints his ideal man, covered with every reproach of crime and worthy of all the rewards of virtue, he paints, feature after feature, Jesus Christ. The resemblance is so striking that all the Fathers have felt it, and it is not possible for any one to mistake it. What prejudices, what blindness, are not required to make any one venture to compare the son of Sophroniscus with the son of Mary! What a difference between the one and the other! Socrates, dying without pain, without ignominy, easily sustains to the end his character; and if that gentler death has not honored his life, one doubts if Socrates, with all his genius, would have been other than a sophist. He discovered, it is said, morality; others before him had put in practice. He did nothing more than say what they had done; he but reduced their examples to the form of lessons. Aristides had been just before Socrates had said what justice was. Leonidas had died for his country before Socrates had made the love of country a duty. Sparta was sober before Socrates had praised sobriety; before he had defined virtue Greece abounded in virtuous men. But where had Jesus found among his countrymen that pure and exalted morality of which he alone has held forth the lessons and the example? In the bosom of the most violent fanaticism the loftiest wisdom made itself heard, and the simplicity of the most heroic virtues honored the meanest of all peoples. The death of Socrates, philosophizing tranquilly among his friends, is the gentlest that one could desire; that of Jesus, expiring amid tortures, injured, reviled, accused by a whole people, is the most horrible that one could fear. Socrates, taking the poisoned cup, blesses him who presents it and who laments him; Jesus, in the midst of a frightful punishment, prays for his infuriated executioners. Yes, if the life and death of Socrates are those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus are those of a God. Shall we say that the gospel history is a fiction? My friend, it is not thus that fiction works; and the deeds of Socrates, which no one doubts, are less attested than those of Jesus Christ. At bottom, this is only to push back without removing the difficulty. It would be more inconceivable that several men had, in harmony with each other, fabricated this book, than that one should have furnished the subject of it. Never would Jewish authors have either caught this tone or alighted on this morality; and the gospel has marks of truth so great, so striking, so perfectly inimitable, that the inventor of it would be more astonishing than the hero."

Pardon the length of my quotation, but it is, while expressing my views of the matter, a more eloquent statement of them than I myself could frame. And coming from a notorious Infidel, it has all the more weight. John Stuart Mill, the Infidel son of an Infidel, the Infidel Napoleon, the Infidel Renan, and many other rejectors of revelation have expressed similar criticisms. It is, then, not altogether my faith that alone discovers such purity, beauty, and wisdom in the Bible.

I am sorry you have not been able to reply to my last letter, and as this is my conclusion, I shall have to trust your honor not to take advantage of my silence, and not to raise any points not legitimately brought before us by my remarks.

An example of your fondness for this is your recapitulation of the alleged resemblances between Zoroastrinism, Confucianism, etc., and the Bible. You very fully elaborated the same lists in your reply to my fourth letter. For a criticism of the charge of plagiarism, I refer the reader to my fifth reply.

I must also trust you not to parody my remarks, as you have, for instance, in your last. I did not attempt any apology for the indecency of the Bible, as I do not consider it has any indecencies, nor did I excuse the charge by asserting the same of Voltaire, Diderot, and Rousseau. I merely stated that it was disgusting to contemplate the affectation of modesty in a system of unbelief that apotheosizes the most profligate and indecent characters and goes in raptures over productions that are foul with moral filth. If the Bible were indecent, of course this would be no excuse, but it is, nevertheless, reasonable for one to ask a critic to remove the beam from his own eye before attempting to detect an alleged mote in mine.

Before I conclude I wish to recall your attention to the prophecies of the scripture. I have already made some quotations referring to Christ; I now call your attention to the wonderful foreknowledge shown by the writers of scripture in delineating the fate of Babylon. And I will not insist upon any earlier date being assigned in this connection to the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah than you admit. Remember that for ages Babylon was the most fertile and powerful country of the world, its magnificence was the astonishment of the ancients, and its power when in its hight the terror of surrounding lands. Of its marvelous fertility Herodotus represents it as incredible to all but beholders. Watered by the Tigris and Euphrates and the numerous canals, the most splendid imagination could scarcely exaggerate its wonderful exuberance, nor the hiight of civilization to which its skilful inhabitants had attained. With walls built with incredible labor and strength, which for two years were impregnable to Cyrus, who encamped for that time, and which strategy and not force at last overcame; the brazen gates, its hanging gardens, and treasures of precious metals and stones, valuable hangings and rich embroideries, which for ages were the greatest booty of ruthless conquerors, Babylon was at the time during which the prophecies of its downfall were written the most magnificent and most powerful city of the ancient world! Consider its greatness then and compare its present condition with the predictions of scriptures and confess if it be not a confirmation of their divine inspiration. And let me repeat, I only insist on such a date as you will allow the prophecies, lest you assert that they were written after the event, and notice that the most unlikely predictions have only received their fulfillment within the last five hundred years. To the student of history every word of the prophecy is pregnant with meaning, for a full treatise on which I must refer the reader to Keith's "Evidence of Prophecy," a little work which it would seem difficult to believe any reader after perusing could retain his skepticism. I will, however, now make some quotations from the prophecy which have been fulfilled since the Christian era—particulars impossible for human insight to guess—yea, even that have been literally fulfilled within the last five hundred years. I will omit all the prophecies relative to the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, its later captivities by the Roman and others, and will merely quote these endings of the prophecies in Isaiah and Jeremiah. The former says, chapter xiv, 19th to 22d verse:

"And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation, neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the shepherds make their fold there. But wild beasts of the desert shall be there, and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there. And the wild beasts of the island shall cry in their desolate houses and dragons in their pleasant palaces, and her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged."

"And Babylon shall become heaps, a dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment, and a hissing without an inhabitant. . . . The sea is come upon Babylon, she is covered with the multitudes of the waves thereof" (Jer. ii, 37–42).

These are a few verses selected out of scores of verses on the same subject. They are clear in their meaning, and were written over a thousand years before their fulfillment, while Babylon was a glorious city, a paradise in her fertility. After the Christian era Babylon commenced its final decline never to again recover. After many centuries of desolation many travelers have visited her within the last hundred years—Sir Robt. K. Porter, Capt. Keppel, Buckingham, Rich, Mignan, Volney, and others—and their testimony is a repetition of the words of these prophecies. Notice the exactness of the prophetical delineation, its very exactness including a seeming contradiction. "The sea is come upon Babylon, and she is covered with the multitudes of the waves thereof," and yet says the same prophetic word, "Babylon shall become heaps," "a dry land," "a wilderness." The Euphrates according to the authorities mentioned above, overflows its western bank, making the country a low, marshy morass; the ruins are inundated, little better than a swamp, and yet there are sunburnt ruins over which the waters cannot flow, and a great part of it is throughout the year "a dry waste and parched and burning plain."

"It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation." The testimony of travelers is that the ruins and soil of Babylon are composed of heaps of rubbish mingled with niter so that it never can be cultivated.

"Neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the shepherds make their fold there." How bold are all these assertions, yet how wonderfully they have been and are fulfilled! All through Assyria and the adjoining regions it is customary for the shepherds to use ruined buildings for the shelter of their flocks, but Babylon alone is an exception. The superstition of the people dwelling near prevents them from entering within the precincts of its ruins. This superstition is so firmly imbedded within the minds of the natives that neither threats nor bribes can influence them to enter it, as abundant testimony to this point, which can be adduced from the narratives of travelers, proves. And the same testimony is furnished that Babylon is the abode of wild beasts, lions, and goats, and the haunts of bats and owls.

I have glanced thus hastily at these few verses; the whole prophecy is fully considered in Keith's "Evidences," pp. 182 to 237. I ask you were these assertions mere lucky guesses? The prophets declare that Jerusalem shall again be inhabited, and Volney says that it is capable of cultivation, but of Babylon it is declared it shall never be. Why was the difference made? Ammon was to stable camels, Philistia to be a pasture, and travelers have described them as such, but Babylon alone was to be excepted from this? How came this happy exception? How, except that the Almighty, who knew the end from the beginning, inspired the writers to make it?

Let us glance at another prophecy, more brief but equally as wonderful. It is from the second chapter of Daniel: "Thou, O King, sawest, and behold a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; and the form thereof was terrible. This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass, his legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and broke them to pieces; then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them; and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth. This is the dream, and we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king. . . . Thou art the head of gold. And after thee shall arise another kingdom, and another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth. And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron; forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things, and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise. And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes part of potters' clay and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron; forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay, and as the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong and partly broken. And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men; but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay.

"And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

I invite your careful attention to these predictions, delivered centuries before Christ with such extraordinary positiveness and ample detail. It is very easy, as is the invariable treatment of Infidelity, to carelessly overlook such prophecies by calling them vague, wild, indefinite, etc., but no such criticism can truthfully be made here. Remember, also, lest you allege that other false refuge that it was written after the events occurred, that this prophecy had been translated into Greek two hundred and fifty years before Christ. The statements of the prophecy are these, that between Nebuchadnezzar's time and the complete subjection of the whole earth to the kingdom to be set up by the God of heaven there were to be four universal empires. I call you to witness that later events have verified this exactly.

The head of gold represented the Babylonian monarchy, which as compared in point of magnificence, riches, and wonderful prosperity to the empire that eventually conquered it was as gold to silver.

The breast and two arms of the image were of silver, indicating that it was to be a double kingdom, and less grand in appearance than the head. Such were the conquerors of Babylon, the Medes and Persians, less wealthy and in character less noble. The type is exactly fulfilled. The body was of brass; the conquerors of the Medo-Persian monarchy were the "brazen soldiers," as the Macedonians were called. I call your attention again to the exactness of the prophecy; the "kingdom of brass which shall bear rule over all the earth." It was the monarch of this kingdom that sighed for more worlds to conquer; in the language of history, Alexander conquered the world. It was during the existence of this kingdom that the Greek translation of the Old Testament was made—the Septuagint.

The next kingdom was in point of splendor and strength, as compared to the Macedonian, as iron to brass. And it was not only to conquer the world, but it was to exceed even that; it was to bruise and break in pieces. The fourth kingdom was to be divided into two kingdoms, the iron legs. I again ask you to particularly notice this; the Romans who conquered the Macedonians were a stern, poor, frugal, and valorous people. How apposite to represent them as iron to other metals! And notice how exactly the prophecy describes the polity of the Roman victors. They not only conquered the ancient world, but they divided into sections and provinces and tetrarchies, as none of their predecessors had ever done—they broke and bruised it into pieces. But the mighty empire itself finally became divided into two kingdoms, the eastern and western; of the former Constantinople was the capital, of the latter the city of Rome of course. Is not the fulfilment wonderfully literal? But further:

"As the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong and partly brittle; and whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men, but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay."

Count at any time after the final disruption of the Roman empire, and see if you can find more than ten kingdoms existing contemporaneously. These things you can verify for yourself. Do you think, sir, that human ingenuity could guess such a prophecy? Could observation ever lead a man to invent such a chain of events, and all be fulfilled? Suppose the prophet had made the second empire a brass one or iron, it would have been false; but what guided the prophet? How comes it that he made the silver a double kingdom and the iron a double kingdom, but made the brass single? How comes it that the second kingdom has no promise of conquering the world, but the third has? and omitting to the third the description of bruising and breaking, he applies it to the fourth? Is it merely a lucky guess, fulfilled in so many particulars after the lapse of so many ages? Why does he so confidently assert that there will never be more than ten great divisions of the Roman empire, and that they will never unite? History has exactly confirmed it. How do you it explain it? During these many centuries, although a Charlemagne or a Napoleon has arisen and seems destined once more to conquer these kingdoms and unite them once more in one great kingdom, yet he has been ever baffled, and the kingdoms still reman in ten great divisions, and they are so this day. Can you assert this to be mere uninspired guess-work? And, reader, do you insist so too?

All except one of these predictions have been exactly fulfilled. I believe the remaining one will be fulfilled likewise:

"In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

Reader, it is now the "days of these kings;" it is the "patience," not the kingdom "of Jesus Christ." Evil is allowed to contine, the gospel of the grace of God is being preached, the elect are being gathered into the fold, but at any moment the judgment of God my fall. Then will the kingdom be set up in power, the stone cut out without hands shall smash in pieces. This part of the prophecy will as surely be fulfilled as the former parts have been. Will you not believe before you have it confirmed to you by experiencing the judgment that shall surely fall upon those who reject the mercy?

These are two prophecies selected at random out of the dozens equally as remarkable. How comes it that predictions as to Damascus, Sidon, Tyre, Jerusalem, Nineveh, Babylon, and other places have been all accurately fulfilled? How comes it that there was such a happy selection. Jerusalem was to be terribly punished, but it was not said that fishermen shall dry their nets there or that its soil shall be scraped away. This was prophesied of Tyre, and centuries after the prediction it was fulfilled. How comes it that it was not said of Ammon that no flocks should pasture there? It would have been false, but it was prophesied of Babylon and it fell true. And equally destructive the prophecies and equally wonderfully fulfilled in scores of other instances.

Let me quote a verse that contains a prophecy, the truth of which has been demonstrated by the history of the ages, and let me put it to your candor if it is not a prediction that is incapable of being truthfully made by the unaided human imagination? It was prophesied of Ishmael, "He will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of his brethren." Nearly four thousand years ago this prediction was made of the future history of the descendants of Ishmael; is it not true? With one exception, all contemporaneous neighbors have perished from off the face of the earth. Many strange predictions about each of these have been fulfilled; the Jews, according to prophecy, were to remain in existence, but were to be scattered all over the wide world, even as they are at this day, but Ishmael was to dwell in the same country, and there he is to-day. Age after age of civilization has dawned around him; within his sight were the most marvelous creations of man; wealth and magnificence, peace and comfort, have blossomed round him, but he has ever remained untamable, a wild man, the hated and hater of all, and such he is to-day. In the words of the Infidel Gibbon, they are armed against mankind. Could any mere man guess this? Or, take another verse:

"Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Jonadab, the son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me forever" (Jer. xxxv, 19). To-day in the neighborhood of Mecca, unterrified by the power and unbribed by the offers of the Mohammedans, the Rechabites dwell, lineally descended, according to their traditions, from Rechab, professing the faith of Judaism and acquainted with the Hebrew tongue. Was this another mere guess?

This incomplete skeleton-sketch of the prophecy and history of two or three scriptural predictions is compiled here for the purpose of inciting research. A dozen volumes would not be an exhaustive treatise of the prophecies of the Bible. Let me commend a reading of Bishop Newton's Dissertations of the Prophecies, Mr. Faber's works, Sir Isaac Newton on Daniel, Keith's "Evidence from Prophecies," etc. Can you afford to treat the matter lightly and carelessly? Whatever may be the origin of the prophetic scriptures, since they have not failed to have exact fulfillments in all according as the limit of their time arrived, so you may be assured those portions which are yet unfulfilled will also occur. It is extremely unlikely and irrational to hope otherwise, for the predictions that have occurred absolutely transcend man's highest intellect to forecast. In the language, then, of the inspired servant of the Lord, I advise you, reader, "Seek ye out of the book of the Lord and read, No one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate, for my mouth it hath commanded and his spirit it hath gathered them."

The cavils of Infidelity are mutually destructive if contrasted together. There is no system in it; the only thing in which its various supporters agree is in abuse and hatred of the scriptures. The earliest of modern Infidels, beginning with Lord Herbert, professed great reverence for the scriptures, awarding them the praise of being the best system of morals ever introduced into the world, and many Infidels to-day express similar praise. On the other hand, while the greatest Infidels have acknowledged this, there is a school less learned, less pure, and less unbiased, who can find no language sufficiently strong to express their idea of the immorality of the Bible. Obviously one or the other is untrue. If indeed the question is asked of the advocates of the latter view to point out the proofs of their charges the answers will be various and in some cases puerile in the extreme. Yet I have seen even these advocates, when anxious to impart a seeming plausibility to a pet theory, absolutely build an argument on the premises of the moral perfection of the scriptures. So dishonest, so unprincipled, so inconsistent, is modern Infidelity. Even in THE TRUTH SEEKER an argument has been based on this to prove that Christianity is derived from Essenism. Yet in the next paragraph, almost, as if forgetful of this concession, the same writer charges the scriptures with every conceivable evil—obscenity, malignity, immorality, hypocrisy, etc.

There is little if anything new in the popular unbelief of to-day. Quibbles and falsity that have been answered over and over are dressed in a new garb and disseminated as if they had never been met and were absolute truth. The favorite arguments of Infidelity are caricature and ridicule; even in this argument, if the levity was eliminated, your letters would probably be diminished in size one-twentieth—even more. The truth of this must be apparent to every reader. Might it not make one pause to investigate? None of the works written upholding Christianity have this taint; they are all, without exception, serious, courteous writings. The gravity of the subject should certainly be protection against flippancy. The man who can treat flippantly the most serious subject, as religion certainly is, deserves pity and contempt—pity for his callous degradation, and contempt, for the littleness of his soul. If it be a stigma on a mind that it is self-debased, if ignorance is a disgrace when learning was easily obtained, how much more is the disgrace of the mind that has no sacred feelings or can treat the most sacred objects of others with flippant caricature. If even religion is false, there is no excuse for such method. The physician who can joke and laugh when performing a dangerous and painful operation is a heartless fiend, and would be treated as such. But it is suggestive in itself that while in works of practical Infidelity caricature and ridicule are recognized as in harmony with their methods, they are never found in the books written against Infidelity.

It is strange the dishonest intellect which men exhibit in opposing Christianity. There is no theory too wild, no slander too base, no falsehood too glaring, no argument too puerile, no course too inconsistent, for the advocates of Infidelity to adopt into their service if it seems to make a cavil to the scriptures or exhibits a blot on their upholders. Men who in other matters are courteous, affable, just, and fair-minded, exhibit the reverse of all these qualities when estimating the merit of Christianity. Misquoted history, perverted facts, exploded theories, all are eagerly swallowed if they seem to bear against revelation; real history, real facts, are all overlooked, and on any words or actions a mild construction will on no account be placed. This spirit, which animates all Infidelity, is, to my mind, another very suggestive thing.

Another remarkable attitude, to me, is the morbid delight with which the vileness and hypocrisy of professed Christendom is paraded, especially if the offender be a clergyman. The predictions of the corruptions of the professing church are scattered through the greater portion of the New Testament epistles with an exactness of delineation that need a very slight knowledge of history to apply them, and therefore the corruptions of doctrine and polity, and the worldliness and unbelief of Christendom, are a confirmation of the divine origin of the scriptures. But apart from this, it has absolutely no bearing upon the determination of their truth and inspiration. Surely if a minister commits adultery it is not because he believes the Bible, which denounces woe on those who do. I may be reminded with that dishonest pertness which is so natural to some scoffers that he is only following the example of David, the man after God's own heart. But, sapient critic, has he not the example of the punishment which befell David; that despite his fasting and prayer and tears, the child of his sin was smitten with death? If a professing Christian is dishonest, if he steals, if he slanders, if he lies, is it because he believes the Bible? Are you so dishonest as to affirm that anything in the Bible upholds his course? I would not impute to you such loose falsehood. Of those who do evil that good may come, the apostle says "their damnation is just." Yea, the man of whom such things are the normal condition is not a Christian, nor can he, while living such a life, be received into heaven, but belongs to that company who are without its holy precincts, where, as the last chapter of the word of God declares, "are the dogs and the sorcerers, and the fornicators and the murderers, and the idolaters and every one that loveth and maketh a lie." But it should not require any length of argument to prove that the fact of Christians being disloyal to the teachings of scriptures is not an argument against them, especially as you would not allow it to be of any weight against Infidelity that some of its prominent advocates have been lascivious and utterly unworthy of credit.

Superstition in all Ages.

This is a work that all should be familiar with. It is a philosophical treatise on Atheism, which, written in French, was translated into English, and now, I understand, is also translated into German and Spanish. Its author was a priest, who despised and abhorred the doctrin he was compelled to preach, yet knowing that if he should openly declare his sentiments the stake would be his fate. His birthday ought to be celebrated throughout the world, and his name proclaimed fortissimo by all public speakers. My views on this profound and unsurpassable production hav twice been published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER office; price, cloth, $1.50; paper, $1.00.

Discussion.

Our Twenty-first Letter to Mr. Mair.

CHRISTIANITY A RELIGION OF LOVE.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I will continue here from the point where I left off in my last in replying to your previous letter, instead of attending immediately to your last. Leaving for the present the order of the theses marked out by you, I will pursue in place of the same the late amended programme which you substituted, touching the influence which Christianity has had upon the world.

While I do not regard the style of your propositions with regard to the effect which Christianity has wielded the best that could be presented, I will take up your propositions briefly.

I shall have to deny your first that Christianity first taught mankind they were and should live like brothers. The facts of history do not bear out this assertion. I showed in my last that the ancient pagan teachers taught the doctrines of humanity, brotherhood, and love of the human race as strongly as did Jesus. I showed that about half a dozen of those philosophers and teachers inculcated the Golden Rule hundreds of years before Jesus taught it, and that is admitted to be the very best of all the precepts of Jesus, and thousands of times has been pointed out as the very acme of moral teaching.

There is no proof to show that the believers in Christian dogmas live any more peacably together than Brahmans, Buddhists, Parsees, Egyptians, and Mohammedans; no, but in reality far less so. Christianity, first of all, was established by the sword and bloodshed under the bloody, murderous Constantine, and has since been sustained by the sword, the cannon, and musket. The most bloody wars the world has known were prosecuted by Christians, and many and many a time Christian nations have waged relentless wars against other Christian nations, making widows and orphans by the tens of thousands, while instances can scarcely be found where Brahmans have fought Brahmans, where Parsees have fought Parsees, where Buddhists have fought Buddhists, or where Mohammedans have fought Mohammedans. In addition to this, it may be added that in no part of the world is there less of the feeling of love and brotherhood than among Christian nations. In no pagan countries have wars been waged on more frivolous pretexts. In no heathen countries has so obnoxious a system of slavery existed as in Christian nations. In no nation do the rich and aristocratic bear down upon the poor and helpless as in Christian countries. In no countries are the peasants and laboring classes compelled to labor harder and for smaller pay than in the lands blessed with Christianity. In no countries are rulers, lords, and capitalists more unfeeling, more exacting and oppressive, than are Christian rulers, lords, and capitalists. More people are sent to prison and to hard labor in Christian countries for various offenses than in all other portions of the world. See how Christian Spain with terrible cruelties drove out from her borders and exterminated scores of thousands of the Moors and Jews. See how with the utmost cruelty she prosecuted her conquests in the New World, how she wantonly slaughtered those who dared to defend their own homes. See how she encouraged the slave trade and oppressed to the lowest state of degradation the people of the countries of the western continent which she subdued. Read the history of the Christian rule of Spain in the West India Islands; read the history of the Christian conquests of Mexico under Cortez; the Christian conquest of Peru under Pizarro, and see if any conduct more horrible and utterly demoniacal was ever perpetrated in this world.

In these countries, as in nearly all the countries in the southern part of this continent and the neighboring islands, the most monstrous wrongs were done the natives. Their countries were taken from them by force; they were compelled to work in unhealthy mines by their Christian masters, where thousands upon thousands of them sickened and died. The thousands that remained were filled by their Christian masters and conquerors with venereal disease of the most horrible character, which caused the most odious death of thousands upon thousands more. Never have the inhabitants of this blood-saturated earth been worse treated, more cruelly wronged and oppressed, than were the aborigines of this western continent of America by their Christian conquerors. The horrors upon horrors that have been committed by Christian conquerors, Christian warriors, and Christian slave-drivers have been sufficient to fill dozens of large volumes and to appal with horror the heart of every person who would read them.

True, in our own part of the continent it was not quite so bad; but here, even, there was a vast amount of Christian cruelty and injustice meted out to natives of this country. Thousands upon thousands of bloody, cruel deeds were committed against them, and, step by step, they were driven from their homes, and, inch by inch, were murdered or driven back from the seaboard to the interior. It is true, the natives showed cruelty when they had the power; but in downright cruelty, meanness, dishonesty, and bloodshed they did not begin to equal their Christian conquerors, who were stealing away their beautiful country and establishing the doctrine of "brotherly love and benevolence."

True, there was one William Penn who was governed by honest, honorable, and humane motives. He made honorable treaties with the natives, he paid them honestly for their lands, and lived with them in the most peaceful relations; but he was not one of the simon-pure, acceptable Christians. He and his friends were persecuted, imprisoned, and executed by Christian rulers in England as heathens and heretics. They were glad to flee to this country for peace and quiet; but they did not always find it. Here they also met with Christian hatred, persecution, and oppression; and one of them, a woman at that, was actually put to death by Christians on Boston Common. To this day the Quakers are not considered real Christians. Thousands of them are unbelievers, and many of them, I am glad to say, read my paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, with much approbation.

It has been much the same as in this country with all the Christian conquests of the world. They have been bloody and most cruel and oppressive.

Coming down rapidly from the time of the bloody career of Constantine to that of the still more bloody one of Charlemagne, in 770, who has been honored as being the greatest Christian warrior of the world, and who, by fierce bloodshed, slaughter, and carnage of the most wholesale character, permanently established what you call "the brotherly and benevolent religion or Christianity." In reading the history of the bloody career of this Christian murderer and tyrant, Charlemagne, it cannot fail to give a pretty comprehensive idea of how the "religion of brotherly love and benevolence" was established in Europe. Supported by the head of the Christian church, he devastated Lombardy, and kept up a bloody warfare of thirty years against the still pagan country of the Saxons and Germans, not sparing France and other countries. It would require volumes to do justice to the deeds of this great Christian warrior; this great Christian butcher; this great Christian ruler. He caused the soil of Europe to be saturated and re-saturated with blood in his efforts to make permanent his own rule and to establish the "religion of brotherly love and benevolence."

He was a triumphant conquerer. He subdued the pagan nations of Europe, he subdued the unbelievers, and caused them to bow in submission to the rule of his "religion of love." He carried with him the banner of the cross and persistently insisted upon administering the Christian rite of baptism to those he conquered. On one day, in 782, this Christian butcher cut off the heads of four thousand five hundred persons at Verden because they refused to accept the Christian rite of baptism, to them the signal of submission and slavery. What a marked example of the beneficence and loving nature of the Christian religion! He simply carried out the doctrine of Jesus, who taught the heavenly doctrine of "Believe, be baptized, or be damned," and Charlemagne, his great captain, said, "Believe, be baptized, or be beheaded;" and he beheaded them if they would not believe and be baptized, as earnestly as Jesus sent them to hell for the same offense.

Yes, Charlemagne was the conquerer of Europe. He put thousands upon thousands to death that other millions might be forced to accept "his religion of love and beneficence." He shaped the map of Europe, which to a large extent has remained to this day. But for his powerful arm and his adamantine heart, paganism would doubtless have existed in Europe many centuries longer. He was emphatically a "soldier of the cross," a captain of Jesus, the great Baptist, and the bloody establisher of "the religion of brotherly love and beneficence."

I cannot begin to trace the bloody track which Christianity for more than a thousand years made over the face of Europe. I cannot more than allude to the bloody, cruel, and horrible wars of the Crusades, which were wholly instituted in the name of Jesus and to spread his religion of brotherly love and beneficence over the land where it originated, and to crush to the earth the Infidels who presumed to accept the teachings of Mohammed and to bow down to his god, Allah.

The bloody campaigns of the Christian Crusades, so called from the figure of the cross, which was carried profusely in all possible colors, were six or seven in number. They spread over all the countries of Europe and continued for one hundred and fifty years —from 1096 to 1248. Millions upon millions of Christian warriors engaged in them; millions upon millions of treasure were exhausted in their prosecution, and from six to ten millions of human beings suffered the most excrutiating of deaths in consequence of them. Such wretchedness, misery, and devastation thus caused have never been known in the world. And these were distinctively Christian wars. They were gotten up expressly to crush opposition to Christianity and to establish in Palestine, the very country where it originated, your favorite "religion of love, brotherhood, and beneficence." But it was an immense failure. The millions of treasure were spent in vain, the rivers of blood flowed in vain, and the millions of human lives were laid down in vain; in vain was all the untold suffering and misery which those Christian wars engendered. The crescent and the religion of Mohammed still rules over the Holy Land, and your religion of "love and brotherhood" has never been able to maintain a permanent foothold there. And the slender existence it now has there is by the sufferance of the followers of Mohammed.

I will not attempt to even name the Christian wars that have taken place from that time to this; but they have again and again caused human blood to flow in rivers, again and again has the thirsty earth drank the blood of hapless human beings shed by Christian warriors and butchers. It is enough to examine some of the deeds of the Christian nations for the last three hundred years. Look at the conduct of Christian Spain toward her colonies. Look at the conduct of Christian England toward her dependencies and colonies in India, as well as in other parts of the world. Did her Christian generals when blowing Sepoys from the cannon's mouth, and when crushing those defenseless nations of the earth, exhibit the religion of love and brotherhood with which you are so enamored? Although that nation assumes to be at the head of Protestant Christianity, is it not also characteristic of her that she has always laid a heavy hand upon those she has brought under her control? Does her present treatment of oppressed Ireland bespeak a rule of Christian love and brotherhood?

Look at how Christian Russia treats her enemies both without and within her own borders. Was her treatment of the Turks a bright example of the vaunted religion of love and benevolence? Is the sending of two hundred thousand of her own subjects, (the most of them perfectly sincere and devoted to their convictions) to the mines of Siberia to drag out most miserable lives in that land of perpetual winter and in those terrible mines where existence is worse than death, a loving policy? Does that Christian nation show that her religion is one of love and kindness? Has not every Christian country that has possessed the power to oppress and crush to the lowest depths of degradation their unfortunate fellow beings, done it on every occasion?

A very brief review of the bloody persecutions which the Christian church has inflicted upon those who dared to dissent in some particulars from the prescribed belief may serve to show how real and active are the love, brotherhood, and benevolence which you lay claim to. In the ninth century under the Empress Theodora one hundred thousand heretics were put to death because they did not entertain the right kind of belief. In the twelfth century the most cruel persecutions were meted out to the honest Albigenses who were so far mistaken as to suppose that they had a right to entertain their own sincere convictions. The head of the church pronounced his anathemas against them, his minions were sent in pursuit of them, they were hunted down in villages, in towns, and in the country. Their bones were broken; their bowels were ripped open; they were thrown from precipices; their tongues were pulled out by the roots; their heads were broken open; they were suspended in all cruel positions; the heads of infants and adults were dashed upon rocks; the women were violated by their murderers, and in a limited period more than sixty thousand persons were put to death in this Christian manner.

The Waldenses were equally unfortunate, because for similar reasons and in a similar way they were made to taste the love and benevolence of the Christian church. They were driven from their homes, their property was taken from them, they were forced to seek safely in fastnesses of mountains, and even here the bloodhounds of the church sought them out and they were beaten with clubs, and dashed to pieces upon the rocks; women and children crawled into the caves for safety, and these human demons closed the mouths of the caves and smoked hundreds of them to death. Four hundred dead infants were taken up in one cave, where they had died in their mother's arms, where both had perished together. This warfare against the sincere Waldenses was kept up for scores of years, and thousands of that deserving people were put to most cruel and horrible deaths.

Simon Montfort received a commission from the vicegerent of Christ to hunt down and murder in all conceivable forms those mild unbelievers called heretics. He was called "the Avenger of the Church," and a more bloody and relentless monster never disgraced humanity. In the name of the religion of Jesus he perpetrated all conceivable enormities, inflicting torture and death upon thousands upon thousands.

The fierce Duke of Alva was another bloody captain of the cross. He laid waste the Netherlands and literally deluged that fair land with blood. It is estimated that under his hand over fifty thousand men and women were put to death for not entertaining just the right kind of belief.

The massacre of St. Bartholomew was a marked instance where the love and beneficence of Christianity was exhibited. In Paris alone sixty thousand persons were most cruelly slaughtered within the lapse of three days. The Seine was literally filled with corpses and made red with the blood of men, women, and children. In the whole of France not less than one hundred thousand persons were thus murdered in the name of the Christian religion on that occasion.

England, Scotland, and Ireland were not much behind in this Christian work of bloodshed and death. The Catholics killed the Protestants and the Protestants killed the Catholics whenever they had the power. In the short reign of "Bloody Mary," a very pious daughter of the church, she signed the death-warrants of nearly three hundred people besides the great numbers who were sent to prison and not murdered. In the reign of her sister Elizabeth, a devout Protestant, the tables were turned and "reformed" Christianity came into power, and the torture, persecution, and murder in the name of the Christian cause went on to about the same extent. I have myself witnessed the racks and the infernal machines of torture that were used by the agents of the church during her reign. She signed nearly three hundred death warrants, and many poor unfortunate mortals were dragged to the block and to the gallows. The rack, the block, and the stake were brought into frequent use. The most unjust laws were enacted against the Catholics. The penalty was death to make a new Catholic priest in the kingdom. It was death for a Catholic priest to come into the kingdom from another country. It was death to harbor a priest. It was death to confess to a priest. It was death for a priest to say mass. It was death for any one to hear mass. It was death to refuse to swear that Queen Elizabeth was at the head of the church of Christ.

The extensive persecutions which the Protestants carried into Ireland were bloody and deadly, but I have not space to dwell much upon particulars. The terrible sufferings and the cruel deaths inflicted on one branch of Christians by another branch of Christians in that unhappy country are quite enough to give an accurate understanding of how much love, brotherhood, kindness, and beneficence, there is inherent in the system. Thousands of families were slaughtered within their own homes. In thousands of cases the brains of little children were dashed out in the presence of their agonized parents and then the wretched parents made to taste death in some horrible form. Thousands were burnt, thousands were thrown into rivers and drowned, and other thousands were buried alive. Ripping open the bowels of both women and men was a favorite means of inflicting death and of showing how much love, brotherhood, beneficence, and mercy these Christian saints and executors felt for Christian martyrs. All this enormity was supplemented by the most unjust and cruel enactments in the way of laws which one set of Christians ever enacted for another set.

It was much the same in Scotland; bands of Christian incendiaries and murderers roamed over that intensely Christian country, burning churches, demolishing the figures of saints, torturing and murdering their fellow Christians in the most inhuman manner. But still you have the hardihood to claim that Christianity possesses more love, brotherhood, beneficence, and kindness than all other systems of religion. It is as false as false can be. No religionists in the world have treated each other with that ferocious cruelty and worse than brutal hate which Christians in thousands upon thousands of cases have, like cruel tigers and soulless hyenas and treacherous wolves, visited upon each other.

It was much the same in Germany. There the blood of Christians and heretics was made to flow in rivers, and thousands upon thousands of human lives were taken in the name of the religion of love which you say Jesus taught, and by the men who claimed to be in possession of that loving religion.

In Spain and Portugal—preëminently Christian countries—this same religion of love was fully exemplified. Here the lovely Inquisition, the beneficent prison, the brotherly rack, the merciful stake, and all the other Christian appliances did their loving work. Here in Spain, in the fifteenth century, three thousand persons were burnt alive; nineteen thousand were imprisoned for life or for a long period, besides being heavily fined, their property stripped from them to build up the religion of Jesus and of love, and this during one year. In another year a thousand persons were roasted to death in the town of Ville Reale alone. The Jews and the Moors in Spain were made to feel to the full what "Christian love, mercy, and brotherhood" really means. They were subjected to the utmost cruelties and to the most terrible injustice. Their property was heartlessly stripped from them. They were given a short notice to leave the country, and were not allowed to take their goods and valuables with them, but were forced to dispose of them for the pitiful sum which their Christian persecutors felt inclined to give them, which was often not a hundredth part of their real value. In this cruel Christian manner more than three millions of the Jews and the Moors, who practically believed in the same loving, merciful God as the Christians, were driven from their homes and made to wander like outcasts and vagabonds on the face of the earth, and were subjected to cruelties and deprivations such as ought to be unknown in the world. Vast numbers were driven to starvation; many died by the wayside, while others were able to reach other Christian countries, where they met with the contumely and cruelty which Christian Russia and Christian Germany are extending to the Jews to-day. In fact, the Jews have from first to last received the most cruel and inhuman treatment from Christians, though the former are the race from which the latter received their religion, their savior, and their God. The wretchedness and human misery caused by all these acts of Christian love and brotherhood will never be known in full.

Torquemada, that bright and shining example of "Christian love and mercy," who was commissioned by the head of the Christian church to burn, torture, and murder God's own children, left the following loving record: Burnt at the stake alive, 10,220; burnt in effigy, the persons having died in prison or fled the country, 6,860; punished with infamy, confiscation, perpetual imprisonment, or loss of civil rights, 97,321; total 113,401. Cardinal Ximemes, his pious successor in the loving and Christian office of inquisitor-general, has 52,855 victims set down to his credit. What a crown of stars these Christian saints must wear in the long and "sweet by and by!" In Spain alone 31,912 persons were reported burnt alive, and 291,450 more perished for dissenting in small points from this religion of love.

A hundredth part of the horrors of the Christian Inquisition and the persecutions and cruel deaths and prolonged agony which men and women have suffered in the name of the loving religion of Jesus can never be known. Victor Hugo, the eminent French writer, estimates the total number of victims of the Inquisition, the stake, the torture machines, and other Christian devices for taking life, at the enormous sum of 5,000,000 persons! Just think of the amount of human agony that has been caused in the name and operation of this religion! Think of the millions of shrieks of agony, the howlings of torture, the groans of despair, the moans of the dying, which year after year, for nearly five hundred years, escaped from, or were smothered in these Christian institutions of love and beneficence. And in spite of all this, in the face of all this, you have the assurance, I repeat, to tell our readers that a loving, merciful God rules over the world and directs all things, and that Christianity is a religion of love, brotherhood, and kindness! How utterly untrue the claims are I will leave our readers to decide.

Under the Christian persecution of witches and its treatment of witchcraft more terrible horrors were perpetrated than the world can ever know; and these enormities were kept up in Christian countries for hundreds of years. Yahweh's cruel command as given in that great book of love and mercy which you adore, "Suffer not a witch to live," has been the authority and the excuse for an inconceivable amount of demoniacal cruelty, torture, and life-taking. The reformer Luther supplemented this monstrous command of his God by declaring, "I would have no compassion for a witch; I would burn them all." And even the divine John Wesley, as late as 1768, showed his partiality for the punishing of witches by declaring that to give up witchcraft was to give up the Bible. Thousands upon thousands of most unfortunate men and women, young maidens and little children, were subjected to the most unearthly cruelties and were made to suffer more than tongue or pen can ever describe, and all this because some loving Christian had charged them with being witches or with being bewitched. The Christian parliament of Toulouse burned 400 witches, all females, at one time on the public square. The Christian Judge Remy, of Nancy, acknowledged to burning 800 witches; 600 were burnt in one bishopric, 900 in another, 500 in Geneva, 1,000 in Camo, 7,000 in Treves. Under the Christian Francis I. more than 100,000 witches (females) are said to have been put to death, and in the total aggregate the enormous sum of 9,000,000 females were put to death in all countries upon the infamous, false Christian charge of being bewitched! Thousands who were put to death in this most inhuman manner must be passed over in silence.

A few of the noble souls which the followers of Jesus put to death in the name of and for the good of their master's religion may be given. Let us begin with the noble and learned Giordano Bruno, who was a student, a scientist, a philosopher, and a most worthy man. Because he was this he was hunted down by the church. He languished two years in a foul prison, and then was burnt at the stake.

Lucilio Vanini was another eminent scientist and philosopher, whom the church would not tolerate. He was arrested by the officers of the Holy Office. He had an inquisitorial trial and was condemned. His tongue was cut out, and he was burnt alive.

Galileo, the eminent astronomer who invented the telescope and made many most important discoveries, and who demonstrated that the earth is a sphere and revolves every day in its course round the sun, came near sharing the same fate. For presuming to avow these great truths he was arrested by Christian officers and taken before the Inquisition in 1633. He was subjected to the most cruel treatment in his old age, and after many months imprisonment in order to save his life, the feeble old man was made to abjure the great truths which he had discovered.

The learned and amiable physician, Michael Servetus, for simply publishing a book in which he honestly stated his belief that Jesus was not absolutely God, the creator of the universe, was arrested by order of John Calvin, and, after an unfair trial, was forced to suffer many cruelties, and was put to a most cruel death—burning with a slow fire of green wood, in Geneva, October 27, 1553. He was kept several hours in the severest agony.

It is hardly worth while, perhaps, to continue the catalogue of distinguished persons who have been made to feel the warmth and strength of Christian love and kindness. For many hundred years the loving Christian implements of death were kept busily at work. The days were made mournful and the nights were made hideous by the constant shrieks and groans of suffering and dying victims. But, thanks to the progress of civilization and the advance in the spirit of humanity, these cruelties have largely fallen into disuse, and the Inquisition, the torturing machines, and the stake are no longer used; unfortunately, however, the spirit of bigotry, intolerance, and cruelty still exists in the Christian church. Many have been made to feel it most bitterly. Your humble servant has not wholly escaped. He has been unjustly wrested from his home, his family, friends, and business, and immured in a prison for a year on a most frivolous and unjust pretext for his outspoken unbelief, with the evident hope that his life would be ended and his business destroyed. He was arrested and prosecuted and condemned by men of your own faith. Perjury was employed on his trial, and the most unjust rulings were given against him that this country has ever known. But he did not die; he still lives to discuss with you the untruths of Christianity and the beauty and sweetness of Christian love.

To aid in a full realization of the character of love, brotherhood, and beneficence which Christianity has evinced, I feel constrained to make a few quotations from Ingersoll: "In the name of God every possible crime has been committed—every conceivable outrage has been perpetrated. Brave men, tender and loving women, beautiful girls and prattling babes, have been exterminated in the name of Jesus Christ. For more than fifty generations the church has carried the black flag. Her vengeance has only been measured by her power. During all these years of infamy no heretic has been forgiven. With the heart of a fiend she has hated; with the clutch of avarice she has grasped; with the jaws of a dragon she has devoured; pitiless as famine, merciless as fire, with the conscience of a serpent, such is the history of the church of God. . . Every nerve in the human body capable of pain has been sought out and touched by the church. Tolerance has increased only when and where the power of the church has diminished. From Augustine until now the spirit of the Christian has remained the same. There has been the same intolerance, the same undying hatred of all who think for themselves, and the same determination to crush out of the human brain all knowledge inconsistent with an ignorant creed.

"Men and women have been burnt for thinking there was but one God; that there was none; that the Holy Ghost is younger than God; that God was somewhat older than his son; for insisting that good works will save a man without faith; that faith will do without good works; for declaring that a sweet babe will not be burned eternally because its parents failed to have its head wet by a priest; for speaking of God as though he had a nose; for denying that Christ was his own father; for contending that three persons, rightly added together, make more than one; for believing in purgatory; for denying the reality of hell; for pretending that priests can forgive sins; for preaching that God is an essence; for denying that witches rode through the air on sticks; for doubting the total depravity of the human heart; for laughing at irresistible grace, predestination, and particular redemption; for denying that good bread could be made from the body of a dead man; for pretending that the pope was not managing this world for God, and in place of God; for disputing the efficacy of vicarious atonement; for thinking that the Virgin Mary was born like other people; for thinking that a man's rib was hardly sufficient to make a good-sized woman; for denying that God uses his little finger for a pen; for asserting that prayers are not answered; that diseases are sent to punish unbelief; for denying the authority of the Bible; for having the Bible in their possession; for attending mass and refusing to attend; for wearing a surplice; for carrying a cross and refusing; for being a Catholic and being a Protestant; for being an Episcopalian, a Presbyterian, a Baptist, and for being a Quaker. In short, every virtue has been a crime, and exery crime a virtue. The church has burnt honesty and rewarded hypocrisy."

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THE ANOINTING SCENES.

John (chap xii) informs us that in Bethany they made Jesus a supper; that Martha, true to her nature, "served;" that Mary, doing nothing, as usual, except hovering over Jesus, "took a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus and wiped his feet with her hair; and the house was filled with the odor of the ointment;" that Judas Iscariot complained of this waste; that Jesus rebuked him, and commended Mary, as customary with him let her do what she would. But a shocking discrepancy is discovered when one reads in Matt. xxvi, 7, and Mark xvi, 3, that the anointing was in Bethany at the house of Simon the leper, and that the lady who performed the feat was simply and indefinitely styled "a woman," without any reference to Mary, Martha, or Lazarus. It is surprising if Matthew, Mark, and Luke had heard of these remarkable women and the resurrection of their brother, as related by John, that in narrating this anointing they should not have stated that it was done by this Mary instead of saying "a woman," as if it was some before-unheard-of stranger. And they must have known of this tragical miracle if it had ever occurred, and have been acquainted with this family. Besides, John states (chap. xi, 2), it was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped his feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick (and the statement is made a whole chapter previous to the anointing). This specification leaves no doubt to whom John referred, though Matthew and Mark seem never to have heard of Mary, Martha, Lazarus, or the raising from the dead, while Luke mentions the two former by name in Jesus's visit when Martha was "cumbered."

Now how do these learned professors get out of this muddle? In order to rid themselves of the anointing supper occurring in two houses at the same time, Martha's and Simon's, Smith kindly accomdates us thusly, "It has been conjectured that she (Martha) was the wife or widow of Simon the leper." You perceive by marrying Martha to Simon he gets them into one house with the "probabilities," as no mention is made of the presence of Simon, that he is dead and Martha his widow. If this was so, how surprising that John and Luke (x, 38) should have called it Martha's house and no allusion to Simon, and Matthew and Mark should have called it Simon's house and no allusion to Martha or Mary or Lazarus. What a wonderful stretch of imagination a conjecture will give in God's holy, infallible word! Infallible no longer since the late revision, revulsion, or reversion has left it with three sheets in the wind so tattered and torn that in all probability the "old ship of Zion" will not weather many more gales, and will never safely arrive in port.

But we are all at sea again, for Brown in his Commentary permits Simon to still live in his own house, and Martha, therefore, not his vidder, never even "conjecturing" that he was ever her husband, but exultingly boasts that, at the anointment supper "between the raised Lazarus and the healed leper (Simon) the Lord probably sits as between two trophies of his glory." Will the revisionist please inform us which opinion is correct, since neither is even hinted at in the New Testament? But lo! a new light dawns upon Smith which furnishes some hope of relieving this narrative of its burden of mistakes or lies. What can this new light be? Read! Instead of being husband of Martha, Simon may be father. Read: "In Matthew and Mark the same feast appears as occurring in the house of Simon the leper; but a leper, as such, would have been compelled to lead a separate life, and certainly could not have given a feast and received a multitude of guests. Among the conjectural explanations which have been given of this difference, the hypothesis that this Simon was the father of the two sisters and of Lazarus, that he had been smitten with leprosy, and that actual death or the civil death that followed on his disease had left his children free to act for themselves, is at least as probable as any other, and has some support in early ecclesiastic traditions."

What then shall we do with the former conjecture that Simon the leper was or had been the husband of Martha! Could he sustain both relations of husband and father toward the same woman at the same time? and is the difference so slight that it is of no consequence? Is it not amazing that Prof. Smith should hazard two such opposing "conjectures" in the same book and not decide upon either? Oh, for a never-failing criterion by which to judge the word of God! Professors, divines, and churchmen, had you not better go to work at some useful employment and no longer seek to reconcile the impossible, but leave God to harmonize his own immaculate, inspired volume as best suits his almighty fancy?

But we are not rid of difficulties yet. As one mountain top rises over another, higher and still higher, so do these insurmountable peaks of theology tower one above another until we are lost in wonder, confusion, and despair! Shall we attempt to scale their inaccessible heights?

What next! Not only are we puzzled to discern with clearness whether the recorded events in the house of Martha and Simon are the same, and the "woman" who broke the box of ointment and poured it on Jesus's head at the house of the latter, as related by Matthew and Mark, was John's lovely Mary, who sat at Jesus's feet learning wisdom while her elder sister was the maid of all work, the Bridget generally, but we find another account in Luke vii so unlike the two former that a reconciliation has never been effected satisfactorily even to the most credulous. Please read the chapter and then judge whether this "sinner" who figures so conspicuously around Jesus was John's Mary and the woman described by Matthew and Mark, the two latter agreeing in nearly every particular.

Here the learned ones have three conflicting accounts to reconcile, and even a fourth is dragged in —Mary Magdalene—some thinking she was "the sinner," others, as we shall see hereafter, scouting the imputation. But in all these cases the women, be they one, two, three, or more individuals, possessed a remarkable tendency toward sitting, standing, or lounging at the feet of a man, and he a young, handsome one too, as alleged, and cleansing those soiled members with their tears, while their hair served the purpose of towels, thus saving the trouble and expense of furnishing and washing those articles. Moreover, the ointment in the record of John and Luke which was also poured on the feet that were wiped with the hair answered a double purpose of anointing Jesus's feet and avoiding the necessity of extra hair-oil for the toilet of these damsels, thereby decreasing expense and adding not a little, "probably," to their comfort and satisfaction, as this ointment was very expensive and difficult to obtain. Anointing with oil and ointment, to be sure, was an oriental custom, but would it not have comported quite as well with ethical culture and modern usages had these godly women presented Jesus with their alabaster boxes and permitted his mother, sisters, or even himself, to have done the anointing, as to have followed him around in troops, and thus personally manipulated his body with ointment and tears. Jesus, however, always seemed not only to take it all in good part, as a matter of course, but accepted it with exquisite pleasure and unbounded commendation, never appearing in the least disturbed by the presence and contact of strange women, harlots, and adulteresses.

Permit the ungodly woman, before closing her review of these godly sisters and these anointing women, to add further comments, and also to comment upon the comments of the holy commentators.

First. The miracle of raising Lazarus is nowhere alluded to in the whole Bible except by John. (Chapter xi.)

Second. None of the evangelists but Luke mention the visit of Jesus to Martha and Mary, when the "cumbered about much serving" scene is so heroically enacted.

Third. Neither of these women is spoken of by name elsewhere, except in the miracle-tragedy and anointing feast. (John xii.)

Fourth. John states that the anointing took place in Bethany, at the house of Martha, and where Lazarus was whom he raised from the dead, and that he was present, while none of the other evangelists mention the circumstance. Matthew and Mark admit it to have been in Bethany, but declare it was at the house of Simon, the leper; but Luke affirms it was at the house of one of the Pharisees. Here are least three contradictions and omissions.

Fifth. John says Mary took a pound of ointment and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair. (Oh, my, what a towel!) Matthew and Mark unite in saying there "came a woman" and performed the act, and persist in assuring us that it was his head, not his feet, on which this woman poured the ointment, both omitting the hair-wiping farce, the head and body-besmearing, in this instance, rendering unnecessary feet-bathing and feet-drying. Here are three more perplexities to gape over.

Sixth. John forgets to mention that Mary's ointment was in an alabaster box, while the other three notice it particularly; but he makes amends for the omission by specifying that she had just one pound of ointment and very costly, while the others say nothing about the quantity or quality. Matthew and Mark, though, agree as to the murmuring about its waste.

Seventh. John in Mary's case entirely overlooks the remarkable prophecy of Matthew and Mark—"Verily I say unto you, wheresoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world there shall also this that this woman hath done be told for a memorial of her" (Matt. xxvi, 13, and Mark xiv, 9).

Eighth. John declares that it was Judas Iscariot who complained of the waste of the ointment, which might have been sold and the three hundred pence given to the poor, etc.; but Matthew protests that it was the disciples who had indignation againt the woman for the waste, while Mark asserts that some had indignation "within themselves;" but Luke skips it wholly, affirming instead, "This man ought to have known that the woman was, or is, a sinner"—three or four discrepancies on one simple point.

Ninth. Luke's account is so unlike the other three that we beg to give it in his own language. He opens his anointing drama at the house of one of the Pharisees, who desired Jesus that he would eat with him. "And he went into the Pharisee's house, and sat down to meat. And behold a woman in the city, which was a sinner, when she knew that Jesus sat at meat in the Pharisee's house, brought an alabaster box of ointment and stood at his feet behind him weeping, and began to wash his feet with tears, and did wipe them with the hairs of her head, and kissed his feet, and anointed them with the ointment. Now when the Phariseee which had bidden him saw it, he spake within himself, saying, This man, if he were a prophet, would have known who and what manner of woman this is that toucheth him; for she is a sinner. And Jesus answering said unto him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee. And he saith, Master, say on" (Luke vii, 36–40). Jesus then gives a parable, and in its application to Simon accuses him of not having properly provided for and entertained him as an invited guest, forgives the sins of the woman, these being the kind of characters of whom he seemed extremely fond, saying to her, "Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace."

This anointing in the house of one of the Pharisees; a woman in the city; her being a sinner; her standing, her washing Jesus's feet with tears, her kissing his feet, her forgiveness, and Jesus's rebuke to Simon, are eight items not set down in the narratives of any of the other three evangelists; while among those three there are, as has been shown under the preceding heads, a dozen or more marked contradictions and omissions.

Was this "sinner" the woman described by the other three? Were the two women introduced by Matthew and Mark one and the same, and were they the Mary of John and the Mary of Luke who "hath chosen that good part?" Brown says it was the same Mary, and that the three scenes in Matthew, Mark, and John are identical; while others are not so positive. Oh, how these divines have racked their brains to solve this enigma still unsolved!

But even Brown does not think Luke's "sinner" can be the same woman described by the other three evangelists. The occasion is not similar, nor the circumstances; but the Pharisee's name being Simon, the same as the host, who appears to make the feast in Matthew and Mark, or at least in whose house it is declared to have been given, throws all the non-inspired ones off the track again, involving them in utter confusion. With all their turning and twisting, comparing and harmonizing, conjecturing and hypothecating, they are still undecided how to dispose of the "perplexing phenomenon," and so have concluded to "draw a veil over it and leave it in the obscurity in which it was found!"

Not so with Brown on another point in these ointment-festival dramas. He is so in love with Mary Magdalene that he is not going to have an odious aspersion cast upon her character by permitting her to be identified with Luke's bad woman, "a sinner, one who had led a profligate life." So he defends her on this wise: "N. B.—There is no ground whatever for the POPULAR notion that this woman was Mary Magdalene, nor do we know what her name was. . . It is a great wrong to this honored woman to identify her with the once profligate woman of Luke (vii, 37), and to call such penitents Magdalenes. The mistake has arisen from confounding unhappy, demoniacal possessions with the conscious entertainment of diabolical impurity, or supposing the one to have been afflicted as a punishment for the other, for which there is not the least scriptural ground."

There you have it strong and full. Who can doubt now? But more of Mary Magdalene anon.

All these four accounts are evidently intended to represent the same feast in the same place, at the same time, in the same house, with the same parties present, the same women serving and anointing, and the same scenes enacted; but such is or was the looseness and carelessness of Bible traditions that all this confusion has arisen from various persons attempting to record as they pleased what were supposed or hoped to be facts. And alas! alas! no omniscient eye was seeing, no omnipotent ear was hearing, no almighty Jehovah was directing; even no Jesus to perceive their thoughts, therefore men must harmonize God's perfect law while he is watching sparrows, numbering the hairs of our heads, and superintending the manufacture of golden breast-plates of cunning work, ephods, bells, and pomegranates of pure gold, graven signets, shoulder-pieces, robes and coats of fine linen of woven work, miters of fine linen, goodly bonnets of fine linen, curious girdles and breeches of fine twined linen, and blue and purple and scarlet, of needlework, in which clothes and holy garments Aaron and his sons should do service in the holy place, as the Lord commanded Moses. (Ex. xxxix.)

Who can tell what Alvord means, as quoted by Brown, in regard to this "sinner?" "The ointment here has a peculiar interest, as the offering by a penitent of what had been an accessory in her unhallowed work of sin." Does he mean to say that she seduced men by performing over, around, and upon them, as she did on Jesus? Hardly that, we should think.

Brown describes Jesus's posture at meals, lying down with his feet out behind him, and the "sinner beginning to wash or to water with a shower. The tears, which were quite involuntary [how does he know?], poured down in a flood upon his naked feet as she bent down to kiss them; and deeming them rather fouled than washed by this, she hastened to wipe them off with the only towel she had—the long tresses of her own hair, with which slaves were wont to wash their master's feet."

He quotes Stier in proof of this statement, and adds, "Kissed signifies to kiss fondly; to caress; or to kiss again and again, which shows what is meant here," and then inquires, "What prompted this?" and goes on gushingly to explain that it was "much love springing from a sense of much forgiveness," and demurring whether she and Jesus had "ever met before," but concludes, "Probably she was of the crowd of publicans and sinners whom incarnate compassion drew so often around him and heard from his lips," etc., running on with a sickening medley of guilt and sin atoned for through love, as if love would counteract crime and buy off punishment, offering it to us now on the same terms as he represents Jesus to have sold forgiveness for sins then, namely, love for him. Is it surprising that Christ's church—the only one on earth for centuries—should sell forgiveness of sins when the Lord and master set them a practical example?

But I forbear, and hasten to ask you to picture to yourselves such a scene as above described in some fashionable city church at the communion-table, with a literal Jesus and Mary thus posed.

To love Jesus seems to be the watchword of the church to-day, and to give all for Jesus; and as he cannot be seen, heard, or personally approached, the female portion of the church seem inclined to transfer the relation to the male teacher, who utters the command, and to administer to his wants in lieu of Jesus, since they cannot feed him with bread and butter, as did cumbered, serving Martha, or anoint his head, feet, and body with ointment and wipe up the slops of tears with their chignons or waterfalls, as did Mary and the women of Matthew and Mark and the sinner of Luke.

What a disgraceful scene women are now taught to believe was an adorable sight and act in the time and life of our Savior! Let us pause and remember Jesus was a man, and these women were women; and what was buncombe then is buncombe now, and that the clergy and Christians generally must be brought to their senses by stripping from these characters and scenes all their sacredness and showing them in their true light. Then forgive the ungodly woman for her part in this painful but necessary duty, as ridicule and sarcasm are ofttimes as powerful and penetrating as solid argument and forensic logic.

The Bennett-Mair Discussion.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Like Elihu of old, I hav been watching the discussion between these two worthy combatants on the basic principles of nature and theology, and I only wish that the Almighty—if there be one—would condescend again to reply to these disputants, as he is reported to hav answered Job and his friends. I would like also to express my opinion.

Mr. Mair says sin is only such by God's commands not to do such and such things, or to fail in doing what he commands to be done, saying nothing of the many unwise things commanded to be done by the "Thus saith the Lord." I wish to know how he or any one else can be assured that the Lord, or any tutelary deity of this planet, ever communicated his commandments to man. If, as the Bible says, they were written by the finger of God upon tables of stone, or given to Moses to inscribe thereon, why does he not now, in like manner, verify their truths or reveal the falsities ascribed to him in this ancient record?

Were it ever possible for God to speak to man, then there was never a time when there was such dire need of his voice being heard from a thundering Sinai or a burning bush.

That Moses and many of the prophets of old were mediums of communication between the visible and invisible worlds there is no doubt; and their "Thus saith the Lord" was only the voice they heard, or impressions they received, from the spirits of their ancestors, who naturally took interest in the Jewish nation.

The whole moral code, especially, of the Bible needs revising, and more of unperverted human nature put in it, and many perverse ideas and customs left out which hav so long tended to fetter the mind in its pursuit of truth; as also to prevent observation, experiment, and reason from arriving at right and natural conclusions and results, on which all progress must forever depend. The moralist or religionist should hav the same freedom of investigation as the experimenter in any other science; and it is this hindrance to sociology that keeps the world lagging in its morality and esthetic progress far behind that of its material and mechanical advancement.

These open discussions are calculated to do much good by clearing up the mystery of God and godliness; and it is a sign of the liberality of the clerical fraternity when they will discuss with Infidels these subjects in the spirit of truth and fairness that has been exhibited between those of such opposit views and beliefs.

L. HUTCHINSON.

Things as They Seem.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: THE TRUTH SEEKER came to hand to-day, and I hav been thinking, thinking, thinking. I am aware that many of your readers do not believe in continued conscious life after what we call death takes place; and yet in the face of the testimony of all ages I cannot see how they can come to such a conclusion.

But I am not going to argue the question; I shall simply state my belief in continued life and in the idea that those who hav lived upon this earth hav a direct or reflex influence here, either for good or evil, and express my regret that the honest analytic intellects who scan the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot believe this, too, and aid us in so seeking the true relations between the two that all resultant evil from this source might be wiped out, neutralized, or turned into good.

Many things result in injury to the race because not understood, and why may not this be one? It is not the part of wisdom to ignore forces that hav been destructiv, for such a course does not remedy the evil. We may resolve to let the flash of lightning or its bolt alone, but just as sure as we liv it will not let us alone until we understand and subdue it to our use.

For my part, I hav the fullest proof of the existence of, to the ordinary senses, invisible, and individual intelligence, but I do not recognize the right of such invisibles to rule me, to demand my obedience, any more than I claim the right to rule them and demand of them the service of self-abnegation. We must first understand the laws that connect us, and then work coöperativly, if at all. The trouble in the past has arisen from blind obedience on our part and arbitrary ignorance on theirs.

When I say arbitrary ignorance I mean that no one who has any real knowledge of nature's methods, or of God's, if you so please to designate the incomprehensible power, no one of real soul-growth, will attempt arbitrary rule.

To-day I took up a book purporting to be written by a spirit through the hand of a medium in 1852. The Jesus idea had not been modified then as now and this spirit purports to be the "high and holy son of God who was known on earth as Jesus of Nazareth." On page 20 of said book I find the following: "They must obey my mediums and recognize me as their prince; must not allow any one to execute the laws or to hav anything to do with the government who does not in heartfelt submission acknowledge me as their king."

Whew! and you are the high and holy son of God, so you claim, and yet you deliberately announce as a principal law of this land—one by which it must be governed to save it from ruin—that which would take every vestige of freedom from us, and make this land of freedom a hierarchical hell. From all such spirits, good sense deliver us! Yet it is the very spirit of Christianity, the same that is trying to put God in the Constitution, and the same in principle that brought this people here with the full intent of establishing God's kingdom upon earth.

I say it is the same principle, but how many different personalities there may hav been, each making the same claim and acting as rivals one against the other for the rule of those here, I am not prepared to say. The world is full of ambitious men who love rule, and absolute monarchies hav not yet ceased from the earth, and as I study this question I find that those who hav left the earth and are still connected with it know nothing of its eternal life, only what they learned while here or hav learned since by attaching themselvs to mediumistic organizations, and consequently are not fitted to rule in those affairs in which we are most directly interested; and the great problem of human happiness here upon this earth must be solved by ourselvs. That is, those who have been crushed by false conditions while in life may furnish the force, the spiritual power, to execute; but the control of that power, its direction, must be in our hands and guided by cool, clear heads, or, as it has been in the past, it will prove an element of destruction instead of salvation.

Speaking of the Mormons, allow me to say that they are a very mediumistic and a very religious people, and their faults, their crimes, hav been and are the result of their excessiv zeal. Admitting the fact of spirits and their influence upon mortals, and the rest is easily explained. An ambitious son of Adam, finding that upon leaving the body he still livs and can connect with earth, such a one thinks that he is wise enough to start the people in the track of perfection. If they will obey him all will be well, and so he looks about, selects those who are willing to work with him, and thus commences operations.

A people whose high-wrought nerve development has made them exceedingly sensitiv furnish many subjects for these invisible, but living, thinking beings to act upon. One is controled, sees visions, makes prophecies which they (the spirits) try to carry out, and he is openly proclaimed as a prophet of God. Others are acted upon by the organ of clairvoyance, still others hear spirit voices, or are controled to speak with tongues, or perform acts of healing. All this has its effect upon their superstitious fears or hopes, they being ignorant of the real law involved, and soon a host are gathered together ready to follow God wherever his chosen agent directs. No more God than is the general of an army! no more the agent of God than is a recruiting officer!

But the world is fast growing out of this blind following of invisible leadership. Spiritualists of to-day, though many of them are weak-kneed on this Jesus question, would unhesitatingly scout such a proposition as that made in the book to which I hav referred, which was written twenty-eight years ago, and well they may, for an attempt to carry out so insane an idea would stamp them with eternal condemnation.

But we all hav much to learn, and as before said, it seems to me better to study this question, and try to so understand it as to wrench from it the good we can, than it is to ignore it.

Suppose it could be proved that Confucius, St. John the revelator, Moses, or Pythagoras really came and communicated with us. What of it farther than as an evidence of continued life? Can they tell us how to so balance the forces of society as to prevent poverty and crime? If so, they hav learned the secret since they went hence. The veriest clod-hopper on earth is of more value to society, if his intellect, sharpened by suffering, discovers and promulgates one fundamental principle, than a perfect history of the past given through any, even the most perfect of mediums, if such history contains no practical lesson of use.

And yet I would not ignore, neither would I depreciate, the law of intercourse between the two states of existence, for by the interchanging tides of life between the two there is growth for each, and the so-called Materialist may be so only of the head, and as to true Spiritual development may be even beyond the theoretical Spiritualist. Let that be as it may, I rejoice in the work you are doing, and hope that you may be long spared to the world.

LOIS WAISBROCKER.

Liberal Spiritualists.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There are many truly Liberal people among the Spiritualists. Among no class do I number warmer friends—as firmly my friends to-day as twenty years ago, notwithstanding my acceptance of Materialism. Their friendship is not predicated upon unanimity of opinion. We hav agreed to disagree in the heartiest manner, with the distinct understanding that Spiritualism or Materialism is proper subject-matter for conversation when it suits our convenience. The old church plan of forbidden tender topics has not entered into our articles of peace. Intellectual peace is stagnation. Such Spiritualists are men and women who accord to others the same liberty of thought and expression which they claim for themselvs; are regular subscribers and occasional contributors for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Boston Investigator, Mirror of Progress, Physiologist, Man, or other this-world periodicals. They are sick and tired of the charlatanism which passes for Spiritualism. They love common sense whether it pertains to the things of this life or any other. They are not so spiritual as to become foolish; and, above all, they are disgusted with the efforts made in certain quarters to constitute Spiritualism a side-show to Christianity.

Charles W. Stewart, a young lawyer to whom I listened with great satisfaction on Sunday evening, March 27, in Chicago, is one of those Spiritualistic speakers who has not sacrificed his reason to spirit afflatus. His legal training has polished his logical faculty. At times he is eloquent; and, unlike most of the spiritually inspired, his discourse is full of points. Indeed I do not think he claimed to be inspired. This may account for the rational character of his utterances.

All over this land there are just such believers in Spiritualism. They do not discuss Materialism hypercritically, but candidly, and hav not the least objection to a free, ungloved handling of their ism by Materialists. Their clear, ringing shout is heard above the din of discussion: "Bring on your anti-spiritual reasons! If we cannot parry your thrusts, we will surrender manfully."

But there is another class of Spiritualists who mumble prayers to some mumbo-jumbo impersonal nonentity. They are made of sectarian stuff, and affect Christian-like horror at the inroads which Materialism is making in decimating the ranks of the Spiritual army.

in the work of enslaving the human mind. For ages they were rivals in the infamous effort to rid the earth of honest people. They infested every country, every city, town, hamlet, and family. They appealed to the worst passions of the human heart. They sowed the seeds of discord and hatred in every land. Brother denounced brother, wives informed against their husbands, mothers accused their children. Dungeons were crowded with the innocent. The flesh of the good and true rotted in the clasp of chains. The flames devoured the human race, and, in the name of the most merciful God, his children were exterminated with famine, sword, and fire. Over the wild waves of battle rose and fell the banner of Jesus Christ. For sixteen hundred years the robes of the church were red with innocent blood. The ingenuity of Christians was exhausted in devising punishment severe enough to be inflicted on other Christians who honestly and sincerely differed with them upon any point whatever. . . . For thousands of years a thinker was hunted down like an escaped convict. To him who had braved the church every door was shut, every knife was open. To shelter him from the wild storm, to give him a crust of bread when dying, to put a cup of water to his cracked and bleeding lips, these were all crimes, not one of which the church ever did forgive, and, with the justice taught of her God, his helpless children were exterminated as scorpions and vipers.

"In 1208 the Inquisition was established. Seven years after the Fourth Council of the Lateran enjoined all kings and rulers to swear an oath that they would exterminate heretics from their dominions. The sword of the church was unsheathed, and the world was at the mercy of ignorant and infuriated priests, whose eyes feasted upon the agonies they inflicted, acting, as they believed, or as they pretended to believe, under the command of God, stimulated by the hope of an infinite reward in another world. Hating heretics with every drop of their bestial blood, savage beyond description, merciless beyond conception, these infamous priests in a kind of frenzied joy leaped upon the helpless victims of their rage. They crushed their bones in iron boots, tore their flesh with iron hooks and pincers, cut off their lips and eyelids, pulled out their nails, and into the bleeding quick thrust needles; tore out their tongues, extinguished their eyes, stretched them upon racks, flayed them alive, crucified them with their heads downward, exposed them to wild beasts, burned them at the stake, mocked their cries and groans, ravished their wives, robbed their children, and then prayed God to finish the holy work in hell."

From the earliest days of Christianity it has been noted for the most acrimonious dissensions. In the second century the quarrel between the branch called the Gnostics and those opposed to them was bitter and fierce. The church was full of schism and contention. The quarrels between the followers of Peter and the partisans of Paul were of the most fervid description. The antagonism between the disciples of Marcion and their opponents was deep and bitter, and but little brotherhood existed between them. Heated and oft-renewed quarrels occurred between the Sabellians and the anti-Sabellians, between the Nestorians and the anti-Nestorians, between the Arians and the followers of Athanasius—which was carried to such bitter extent that the latter was five times compelled to flee into the desert to save his life. The deadly quarrels between the two branches of the Christian church were so protracted that councils of bishops and priests were called to settle them, but these councils were often remarkable for nothing save bitter and constant quarrels and fights between the members; fisticuffs and kicking were not unfrequently indulged in. From the Christian writer, Tindal, we have it, as I showed in a previous letter, that the bishops often "fell foul on one another" and "came to blows" like prize-fighters, and that on one occasion Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, cuffed and kicked Flavinus, patriarch of Constantinople, "with that fury that within three days after he died." The bitter quarrels between Trinitarians and Unitarians, the Socinians and the anti-Socinians, between the Catholics and the Protestants, the disciples of Luther and the disciples of Calvin, the regulars and irregulars, the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians, the church of England and the Puritans, the Conformists and the Nonconformists, the Orthodoxy and the Independents, the Dissenters, the Methodists, the Quakers, the Universalists, and the hundreds of other sects that have risen from time to time—the quarrels, opposition, animosities, and hatred between all these contentious Christians—have been so long-continued and so persistent as to utterly preclude the quality of love and brotherhood which you attempt to assert has been the great feature of Christianity.

The fiendish and acrimonious contentions, and the protracted warfare between opposing candidates for the papal chair, the positions of cardinals, bishops, etc., etc., have been a distinguishing characteristic of Christianity and a great disgrace to mankind. The wars between opposing vicegerents of Christ have often caused human blood to flow in streams, and human life has paid the penalty.

Even in our own time there is very little proof of an undue amount of love and brotherhood in the Christian church; the quarrels and contentions between the different denominations continue much as they have for fifteen centuries. If they have ceased to burn and torture each others' bodies, they hav not ceased to contend and to say very unkind things of each other. This is not only true as between Catholics and Protestants, but it is also true as between the different sects of Protestants. A large share of your own church will not even commune in the sacred rite of the eucharist with the members of other churches. It is not only between sects and churches that these quarrels exist, but even in the same churches do the most bitter quarrels take place. I have in my own time known of scores of these Christian contentions, and there are few men of my age who hav not known many of these pious quarrels. Your claim of superior love and brotherhood among Christians is not sustained by the facts. Christians show no more love, no more fraternal feeling, no more humanity, either toward others, or among themselves, than any other people. They show equally as much intolerance, as much narrowness, as much unforgiveness, as much dishonesty, as much disposition to take advantage in a trade, as much fondness for getting the best of a bargain, as any other people in the world. Out upon your claims of Christian love and brotherhood!

I claim that I have shown that Christianity has not been a religion of love, but rather one of hate, violent and bitter hate. Jesus is claimed to have said he "came not to send peace, but a sword," and most signally have his followers made his words true. They have done more fighting and committed more bloodshed than any other religionists in the world.

I will defer until my next the consideration of your other claims. Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

Letters from Friends.

LEADVILLE, COL., June 6, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed in my letter I send you the sum of $7—$5 for the trip round the world, and $2 for Mrs. Chase for the defense of her paper.

Fraternally, JOHN BEAUVAL.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, June 27, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find check for $10 to help you a mile or two on your trip round the globe. I trust you may hav a safe trip. I know the account of your trip will be interesting. Dust your glasses well and see all you can. Good-bye and good luck go with you. Yours, E. B. BROWN.

ETNA, MINN., June 22, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: Inclosed you will find my $5 for your trip. I am a Spiritualist, so I shall pray for the good spirits to attend you and bring you home safe. I am anxious to read your letters from foreign lands, especially from Asia. MRS. G. W. PARKS.

McLEAN, N. Y., June 26, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5, the price of one fare for the round trip. I will be on time, for I am anxious to see the wonders on the way. I hope and trust that the conductor, with his great train load of Infidels, will make the trip safe and satisfactory to all concerned. R. A. CLARK.

TRENTON, OHIO, June 15, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5, the amount I promised for the world trip. I am glad that I hav got the money, as I hav been hard up for some time, and was afraid that I would be left behind. I wish you good luck, health, plenty of money, and all enjoyment to make a fellow happy.

Truly yours, CARL PESSEHL.

BARKERS, N. Y., June 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see you think of starting to go round this ball, so here goes the five dollars I promised. When you were in prison I felt like donating, and did so; and when you went to Europe I contributed my mite; but as I expect value received for this remittance, it does not appeal to my sympathy. Of course, we take our chances on your luck and safe return. I do wish some good Liberal artist of means could go with you; you could help each other so much, make a sure thing of it, and do a better job. I hope the money will pour in to you like rain. There is no danger of your getting too much.

Sincerely yours, F. N. ALBRIGHT.

ALLEGHENY CITY, PA., June 7, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find my mite—that promised $5. When I read your announcement under the heading of "That Long Journey," I concluded that you intended to make it, and my feelings overcame me to that extent that tears came to my eyes and my heart into my mouth, for gratitude, not that I am so overanxious to see you off on such a long and perilous tramp, but because I, through the teachings of my heart and conscience, am forced to know that you are an honest man; one who loves the truth and hates a lie; one who loves his friends as himself, and treats his enemies with that considerate leniency which is equal to, "Do good to those who despise you."

When you said, "I placed myself in the hands of my friends, and they hav voted twenty to one to go. I hav little choice in the matter save to go and do my duty, which I shall endeavor to perform to the best of my ability," I believed you from the very bottom of my heart. I believe also that what we will get in return for our mere mite will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in the name of D. M. Bennett.

Now, friend Bennett, as many friends hav been asking for impossible and unexpected favors in the shape of relics from those distant lands, I hav a favor to ask, which is not impossible, and which I trust you will grant, namely, you proposed to insert the names of all the donors to the round-the-world fund in the book you expect to get out, and to whom it will be dedicated; therefore I would ask you to insert the name of your little namesake in the place of mine. He is liable to outliv his father, hence he will hav the opportunity to keep the work in circulation and your name before the world some years after I am passed away. He is now seven months old, and I call him Bennett, in honor of yourself; and as you hav been and are bound to be victorious, I hav his middle name Victor (Bennett Victor Cutshall). Will you grant the favor?

Now I earnestly request all our TRUTH SEEKER friends who hav subscribed to this fund to remit as soon as possible, for you all know that Bennett, our great leader and champion, is unsettled and is getting anxious to be up and doing.

Yours with many good wishes, J. A. CUTSHALL.

PITTSBURGH, PA., June 13, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find a post-office order for the five dollars I promised to you some time ago. I hope that you will hav a pleasant, safe, and an enjoyable trip, and return safe and sound in health, which I believe you pretty well know how to keep by experience, which was proved by your trip on the continent of late. In case you should run short of money to carry out your undertaking thoroughly and make a good job of it while you are at it I will go at least five dollars more on due notice from you.

I believe you will be safe in trusting your paper to friend Macdonald while you are away.

I hav no fear but that you will giv us the whole truth of all you will see that will be of special interest to all mankind.

Our League here is full of life and getting very interesting in our rather bigoted city. We hav generally a full attendance every Sunday afternoon.

I hav no advice to giv as to your journey, but I hope you will journey cautiously, to a certain extent, enough to guard yourself in different countries to be on the safe side of self-preservation. You hav my best wishes, and fare you well.

I am, respectfully, JACOBUS JOSEPHUS.

SCRANTON, PA., June 18, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Your explanation is satisfactory. I am glad to see you look after the pecuniary interests of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for long may it liv! I wish this for what it has done for me. The scales hav fallen from my eyes, for whereas I was once blind, I now see, although brought up in the hard-shell, cast-iron faith that what is to be will be if it never is. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the first Liberal paper I ever read. Your intended humiliation, your vindication at home and abroad, was watched with more than an ordinary interest for a new convert. Your trip to Europe is grand. Unearth the frauds of ages. Accept my check and best wishes

Truly, L. M. BUNNELL.

SENECA, S. C., June 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed herewith find $5 toward the traveling fund, which please giv due notice. I hav delayed this remittance on account of Mother Shipton, but at last regard her reputation as undoubtedly lost, and her deserved fate will be recorded with many of the old girls gone before. However some other fellow who knows it all will probably agree to fix a day for Gabriel to toot his horn. But you need hav no faith or alarm, as you are one of the elect. My advice is, should any accident occur and you wish to be at home, pull for the shore.

Yours truly, W. H. STANTON.

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 10, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: Inclosed find check for $10, the amount subscribed by A. H. Frank for your round-the-world trip; hope you will excuse the delay in sending it, as he was busy preparing for a trip to Nevada and did not think of it till he got to Chicago.

If some one does not furnish the yacht for the long cruise I shall hav to stay at home, so I hope if you see the model of the ark you will take her lines off and publish them, as all the cuts that I hav seen of it are inaccurate, or God must be a very poor naval architect, as she does not seem to be adapted for anything, but might make an ordinary lumber barge. Some time ago I saw an article by some Christian who evidently had very long ears, claiming that the Great Eastern was modeled after the Ark, which, if true would make God out a greater fool than the aforesaid pictures, as the Great Eastern, when in the trough of the sea, is a regular tub to roll, and if she had no sails or steam would drift into the trough and stay there.

Yours truly, THOMAS PAINE FRANK.

WORCESTER, MASS., June 13, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: Your postal acknowledging the receipt of $3 25 paid for THE TRUTH SEEKER from Dec. 1, 1880 to Jan. 1, 1882, and the balance, $1.75, subject to my order, with the $3.25 inclosed in this, makes up the present for you, the $5, for your trip around the world. I hope, friend Bennett, you may be spared to make this journey. Your letters from Europe were so interesting that I dare say your proposed trip as you travel will giv all of us more information that interest our views than any that has been before you; at least we found your European letters so. Good-bye; may you long liv and hav a good time. Yours truly, V. R. REDWOOD.

JUNIUS, N. Y., June 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed is $5 for your trip round the world. I would like you to see Mount Ararat, where the ark rested, and the knoll where God and Jacob wrestled. With esteem, DAVID COSAD.

GALT, ONT., June 7, 1881.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Inclosed are $10 more for the pilgrimage, which credit to the anonymous subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

So you see this little ultra-orthodox town has panned out pretty well after all. I hope you have one earnest man in every town THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches who will exert himself to increase the list of names to the fund. Of course there will be some (not many, I hope) who are always going to do something in the sweet by and by, who either cannot or will not forward their money now. All will be interested in this great work, and especially those who hav read your plain, unvarnished tale of your reception in prison, standing with your face to the wall at the command of a menial—an innocent man compelled to stand at a bench till his feet swelled, and only obtaining relief from the cold stone flags of a cell—but it is worth something to know that there is more mercy and blessing in a stone than in these fiends of Jesus. Any one elaborating just a little upon this merciless persecution, and that every dollar forwarded now will add to your power of observation and the value of the books, can do something toward closing the gaps in the ranks.

With the best wishes of these friends for the success of your long and (I hope) pleasant journey, believe me, Thy friend, WM. E. RENWICK.

MEXICO, MO., May 30, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been sick for the past three weeks. Under these circumstances I hope to be excused for not remitting sooner. I see that you hav concluded to make the long trip. Inclosed find the $5 promised, and on your return there will be three ones ready if I liv. And if I don't liv you will get it all the same. As the old colored preacher said to his congregation, "If de Lord am willin" dar will be preachin' in dis school-house next Sabbath day, an' if he am not willin' dar will be preachin' anyhow. Pass de hat."

I suppose you hav heard of the cave where Lot and his lovely daughters had such a jolly old time. Just call that way and get the whisky-bottle and hav it filled with Irenæus's wine. The bottle is there to this day; so is Lot's wife. Be careful.

I hope you will hav much pleasure on your journey and no misfortune. With respects to Mrs. Bennett and yourself, I remain, as ever,

Your friend, D. C. KNODERER.

SALINAS, June 3, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ.: Please find inclosed check on New York for $25—$5 for Dr. Trimmer, $5 for Jacob Wallace, $5 for Austin Smith, $5 for Frank Maxwell, and $5 for your friend, W. B. Ford, all of Salinas.

Hoping you will hav a pleasant journey, I remain,

Yours, W. B. FORD.

SPRINGFIELD, MO., June 26, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: It has all the while been my wish and intention to aid you some in your contemplated trip round the world, and although rather late in the day I trust the inclosed $5 will not reach you too late to render the desired service. I feel quite sure the book you will probably write of your travels will be one of unusual interest, inasmuch as your good memory, acute observations, and most wonderful faculty for relating what you know are so much above the average.

All will, I am sure, feel that the investment is a good one.

Should you pass Mrs. Lot's statuary, as of course you will, it might be well to secure a fragment or so from some of her projections, just to convince the heathen in these parts, as well as many of those claiming to be followers of the lamb, of the truthfulness of the Bible account of her miraculous preservation.

If the Bible is true (and none but Infidels do doubt it), you will surely find her strolling, as she was at the time the narrativ was given, looking back upon the ruins of her home—a fearful warning to all women for her disobedience to Jehovah. Not being a woman, I feel, however, at liberty to doubt the truthfulness of this story at least, and feel, furthermore, a little skeptical in reference to the great mission work done among the heathen by our Christian missionaries, which you, brother Bennett, will be able, I trust, to investigate and to giv to us a correct report. A few statistics from the other side of the house may not be devoid of interest, and probably much more to be relied upon.

May good health, peace, and prosperity attend you, dear friend, is my prayer for humanity's sake. Amen.

J. S. LYON, M. D.

LEBANON, OR., June 13, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find money order for $10—$5 for John Settle, and $5 for myself—to help you on your trip round the world. If you enjoy yourself I know I shall be satisfied. May every comfort and pleasure attend you, is the wish of,

Your friend, A. ERVIN.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5 to pay my pledge to help you make a circuit round our planet. Hoping that our immortals, Paine, Voltaire, Hume, Franklin, Jefferson, Lincoln, and a host of others will accompany you, that good health and kind friends may be your lot, that Mrs. Bennett may enjoy peace, happiness, and be sustained by kind and loving friends, is the wish of your friend,

DR. GEO. W. LUSK.

CITY POINT, FLA., June 4, 1881.

DEAR BENNETT: Inclosed find post-office order for $5 for the trip round the world. I must hav the book so that I can take the trip round the world at home. With best wishes to you and Mrs. Bennett,

Yours, ALBERT FABER.

NASBY, MO., June 12, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: Inclosed find postal order for $5 for the Infidel round the world. I am glad you hav decided to go, although Bro. Green, of St. Louis, and others seem to think you had better stay at home. If any accident should befall you we would perhaps regret that you embarked in the great enterprise. But then, on the other hand, if you succeed every true Liberal heart in the world will thrill with joy and swell with emotions of deep gratitude for the good you will confer on humanity by giving to the world in book form an unbiased standpoint of the true conditions and traditions of theology as you find them among the different nations of the earth. My sincere well wishes attend you.

Respectfully, H. B. MILK.

CANYON FERRY, MON., June 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I am glad you hav decided to make the round trip, and I inclose $5 to help you on your way. A pleasant journey and safe return is the sincere wish of your friends,

MR. and MRS. J. V. STAFFORD.

MAYVILLE, MO., June 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Find inclosed draft for the "V" promised for your trip round the world. Come by as you come home from your trip, as I am on your route from Omaha to St. Louis. Would like to giv you a shake. Yours truly, JOHN J. KELLY.

LEONARD, NEB., June 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find check for $5, as our share of the needful to send you round this little globe. I expect to get the worth of the money in the pleasure of reading your letters. We send our best wishes with you.

Yours truly, MRS. PETER GULICK.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., May 31, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you kindly consider the undersigned as one deeply anxious to see THE TRUTH SEEKER, under its present management, increase its issues to an unlimited extent? That it may reach in my day a subscription list of two hundred and fifty thousand, let me suggest a thought to this end. 1. Posters, large, medium, or small size, for post-offices, offices, stores, dwellings, fences, etc., containing but a few words, that it may readily be read, say something like this: "THE TRUTH SEEKER is the largest Freethought paper published. D. M. Bennett, editor, 141 Eighth street, New York. Sample copy sent by mail on receipt of ten cents in coin, currency, or postage stamps." To this could be added a list, or partial list, of contributors; 2. This might consist of a circular containing more extended information of the history and purpose of THE TRUTH SEEKER, giving also commendatory excerpts from other papers. In this circular a very important point should be made of the fact that THE TRUTH SEEKER is to contain the correspondence of its editor-in-chief on his trip round the world. Of this some short reference might be made in the posters also.

I think, Mr. Editor, this will prove a good investment; however, I may be mistaken; but as far as I am concerned, I would almost take it as a privilege to invest in twenty-five or fifty cents' worth to stick up and giv away on my own account. In view of such an undertaking, would it not be best not to rush off too quickly on your round-the-world trip, so that new subscribers could hav an even start with you? For is it not true that, once you get the start of us, it would be hard scratching to catch up? For one, I would not like the task, and I am one of those who judge others by myself (as if I could possibly judge by any one else).

Birdie Shuck asks, "I would like to ask Dr. Hardcastle what bearing his blood-lettering has upon a future life when the occurrence took place long before his sister departed this life?" If my memory serves me rightly, Birdie is quite a young miss, and perhaps for this reason is the more expectant of a reply. I think if she will re-read my letter she will see that I claim it as a fact wholly unaccountable only under the theory of the existence of spirits. I cannot here, even if I had the ability, giv her anything more than the fact with which, if she believe me, she herself must wrestle. I do not want to form conclusions, but simply state facts for the consideration of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but of course am also allowed to form my own conclusions. Birdie concludes her little love-note to you, Mr. Editor, as follows: "However, I expect you will go, and if you do, you must remember that you will always hav one little girl thinking of you who would pray for you only that she knows it would do no good." Now I want to giv you a definition of prayer which I hav adopted, and ask if, by this test, most, if not all, of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers are not given to prayer—not, however, lip-service? "A sincere desire of the heart unuttered or expressed; the motion of a hidden fire which trembles in the breast." Now by this test I think Birdie prayed for you, and many a heart has softened and many a loving tear been shed because of it. DR. GEO. HARDCASTLE.

CIRCLEVILLE, O., May 22, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: I see you hav very many advocates encouraging both by word and cash deeds the idea of your taking a trip around the world. It seems to me it will be quite a severe tax on your physical strength to perform such a long journey, yet I doubt not that it will prove a solid blessing to Liberalism and even if your life go out in the great undertaking we can safely say it could not be extinguishd in a more glorious cause. Whether you go or not you hav my best sympathies and good will. If we never meet again in this world I am firm in the Spiritualistic belief that we shall fall into each other's company after the final dissolution of our mortal parts. Nothing would suit me better than to put the shoulder to the wheel with you in helping to roll on the great truths you are trying to promulgate through the glorious TRUTH SEEKER, and your books so full of truth and progressiv light. But since conditions do not seem to favor such a union, I strive to think, with Pope, "What is is right," at least so far as I am concerned in the matter. In perusing the pure, clean pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER I am reminded how much your paper is like a diamond of the first water. No matter how much dirt, mud, and gravel surrounds a true diamond, it is none the less a diamond, none the less brilliant when washed from all external impurities.

In my estimation every copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER sent out into the broad world is far more precious to mankind than so many precious diamonds. Although some may chance to fall into bad company, as among Comstockers or other church buzzards, decoys, and mean men, who beholding the plucky paper all aglow with the fire of truth, begin to throw dirt, slime, and mud to put out (were such a thing possible) its burning truths, lest they come to get somewhat scorched thereby. Alas! such foolish mortals will find the truth will ever liv in spite of their venom, and it will shine and burn, and only burn that which is dross, whether it be church dross, or any other false rotten ideas, or whether it be mercantil lies; intemperance of all sorts, political mistakes, backbiting, obsenity, etc.

The fact is there is no such thing as progress from false theories, whether religious, secular, or what not, until doubts arise in the living activ minds that cannot be satisfied to plod along in the old crooked, uncertain Indian-like trails of the past, but seeing a better road, a more sure and safe way, they gladly switch off into it, when lo and behold a multitude of lying priests and swarms of their willing dupes shout, "Infidel, Infidel!" but they are too dishonest to speak the real truth, and say to the teeming world, "Infidel diamond, behold how glorious!" E. D. BLAKEMAN.

RICHFORD, VT., June 9, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I failed to get the last number of your paper, May 28th. My last was May 21st. I was sorry, for I wanted all your discussion with Mr. Mair. He came to the great point in his reply to your fifteenth, June 4th. He said the word world should hav been translated land—one of a thousand evidences that our Bible never was translated, only rendered from one language to another, falsely every time. He says: "Our Bible is easily understood. But none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall." Although there are one hundred and fifty different translations, commentators are not necessary for those who are Christ's; they hav the holy spirit in them to teach them. The "Ruarh Elohim" of bigotry.

I was much pleased the other day at finding two of my old neighbors who wished to read my paper and Kersey Graves's works. I told them I was happy to accommodate them. I hope I shall be able to circulate them. Politics, fashion, and ignorance rule my town. If I could circulate my books I would send for more; hope I shall when I write again. You think of starting on your journey; my best wishes attend you, and earnestly desire your return.

With respect unbounded, JOSEPH NOYES.

Ruth.

BY ALHAZA.

And Ruth fled from Boaz.—Jewish Legend.

She pressed her sandal on the rock
Where wept the dewy tamarind tree,
And leaped into a dark abyss
As souls can brave eternity.

She hoped to find the limpid stream
Where first she caught his witching look
When darkly fell her raven hair
Upon the mosses of the brook.

He heard her anklets' tinkling sound,
And turned and caught her in his arms,
And hid within his mantle fold
The splendor of her snowy charms.

"Oh, shield me from that grim old man!
When goodliest ears I tried to glean
And beckoned every golden head,
His frightful shadow fell between.

"Weary I wandered from his smile;
I found the woodland's tangled maze;
The coolness of a dripping rock,
The thirsty lambkin's piteous ways.

"I whispered that my heart was sore—
Wan lilies heard the moving tale;
They hid it in their raiment sweet
And breathed it soft to every gale.

"The palm-tree lifted up its voice
'Neath Bethlehem's blue and happy sky,
And rose and fell its organ tone
To lift my mournful thoughts on high."

"I watched thee, Ruth, at fiery noon,
But midnight brings a heaven to me.
Old Boaz hates each glimmering star;
He lurks beneath that poisonous tree.

"Then let him spread his mantle wide;
It shall not touch thy balmy breast.
Lean down, dear Ruth, among the flowers,
And I will guard thy peaceful rest.

"A dim shekinah glimmers here;
A stream is bounding from its lair:
And if you speak one tender word
The great Sanhedrim will not hear.

"Lo I was meek when thou wert far;
Calm veiled saints passed slowly by,
The gems my spirit used to wear
They wove upon the summer sky.

"Will Jah forgiv me if I hold
Close in the temple of my breast
A sacred bird with golden wings
That sings my sorrows all to rest?

"Behold a prophet loved this tree;
He did not fear the drifted snow;
Of goat-skins was his mantle made,
But 'neath the summer's parching glow

"His withered form was sawn in two
Because he would each bosom scan,
And fix on guilt his burning look,
And whisper low, 'Thou art the man.'

"I would not be a driven beast
That trembles at his master's rod;
The voice of reason is more dear
Than prophet, priest, or angry God."

I'd Never Smile Again.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

If I believed in that dread place
Where billions writhe in pain,
In untold agonies of woe,
I'd never smile again.

If I believed my friends were there
The thought would crush my brain;
I'd curse the day that I was born,
And never smile again.

If I believed one soul was there
I'd weep my eyes away,
I would not want my greatest foe
Dwell there a single day.

I'd wish the world had never been,
Or ever breathed mankind;
I'd wish our race would cease to liv,
Die, body, soul, and mind.

I'd wish the sun would cease to shine.
The stars fade from the sky,
The universe sink into nought
And God himself might die.

Nature.

BY E. W. A.

Instinct in the animal,
And reason in the man,
Are attributes of nature
That never had a plan
For nature is perfection
Which works without a plan,
So never uses reason,
The attribute of man.
These assertions may seem strange,
And to many new,
As counter to theology,
Thought so long as true;
But facts are stubborn things,
We cannot alter them,
More than fruit can poise in air
When severed from the stem.
The laws of nature never change,
They are the same forever,
Working in a perfect way
Forever and forever.

If the Devil Were to Die.

Brother saints and moralizers,
Though I wish not to offend,
I would ask if it is justice
To defame your dearest friend,
That you every Sabbath do it
Is a fact none can deny;
What would be your situation
If the devil were to die?

Recollect those worthy shepherds
Who in such rich pastures dwell;
Pious deacons, bishops, parsons,
Cardinals, priests, and popes as well;
If by chance they lost their father,
Where for refuge would they fly?
Wretched would be their condition
If the devil were to die.

Where would be those happy gatherings,
Called camp-meetings, every year?
Where would be those wailing brethren
And those weeping sisters dear,
If there was no one to tempt them
To be sinful on the sly?
Thousand Isles would he deserted
If the devil were to die.

There would be no Rines and Beechers
Luxuriating like a Turk,
And the Moodys, Sankeys, Murphys,
All must starve or go to work.
Canting would be at a discount,
Truth would triumph o'er a lie;
Who would fight about religion
If the devil were to die?

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

PLAIN HOME TALK,

EMBRACING

Medical Common Sense.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M.D.

This book is a plain talk about the human system, the habits of men and women, the causes and prevention of disease, our sexual relations and social natures. It is medical common sense applied to causes, prevention, and cure of chronic diseases, the natural relations of men and women to each other, society, love, marriage, parentage, etc. Embellished with two hundred illustrations. Price, $1.50. Sold by D. M. BENNETT,

A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

12mo, 206pp. Price, $1.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

SOCIALISM.

A Reply to Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D. By an Independent Socialist.

12mo, 67pp., paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

RELIGION

AS REVEALED BY THE

Material and Spiritual Universe.

(ILLUSTRATED.

By Edwin D. Babbitt.

It treats of the Existence and General Character of God, God as a Spirit, the Nature of God, Creeds and Practices of Christianity, The Dangers of Infallible Standards, The Christian Bible Tested, Religions Tested by their Fruits, Life and Death Under the Old Religions, Life and Death Under a Spiritual Religion, The Future Religion.

The book is a scientific, philosophical treatis upon the above and other subjects, by a thorough scholar. He is widely known by his "Principles of Light and Color," "Health Manual," etc., and this new book is sure to be read with even greater interest than those.

CHRISTIANITY

FROM A

Scientific and Historical Standpoint.

BY WM. N. McLAREN.

A very able pamphlet of 140 pp. Among the subjects treated are, Unrevealed Religion, Old Testament Religion, Evidence in Support of Christianity, History of Christianity, Alleged Failure of Christianity, Proposed Substitute for Christianity.

The book is very radical and thorough, and shows conclusivly that the system of religion which has been built upon the Bible has a very unstable foundation.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

To MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—DR. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

'Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF AMERICA.

It is a fact well known to every individual in this country that all new inventions hav been opposed by the very class of men who should make inquiry respecting the same. For instance, Fulton with his steamboat, and Stephenson with his locomotiv.
Then we had legislators in our Congress who looked upon Morse as a lunatic when he asked for a short line of telegraph between Baltimore and Washington. Yet to-day what should we do without our telegraph or steamboat and locomotiv?

THE INVENTORS OF ALL THESE THINGS HAV HAD TO BEAR THE INSULTS OF ALL SO-CALLED SCIENTISTS. WHY, EVEN SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, ONE OF THE GREATEST CHEMISTS THAT EVER LIVED—HE WITH ALL HIS LEARNING PROVED HIMSELF A FOOL WHEN HE RIDICULED THE IDEA OF LIGHTING OUR STREETS WITH GAS. HE SAID IT WAS AN IMPOSSIBILITY TO SO USE COAL GAS.

What to-day should we do without such a medium of light? Our sewing-machines—they were also opposed by those whose interest it was to oppose them. Thousands of instances may be quoted where articles now in daily use were ridiculed by the people whose interest it was to keep back the introduction of such inventions.

Now, then, as to the WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

THIS INVENTION IS AS NEW TO THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOOLYN AS WAS THE FIRST INTRODUCTION OF STEAM-ENGINS AND ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS, AND YET THE PEOPLE, ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, HAV NO MORE SENSE THAN TO ASK THEIR PHYSICIANS WHETHER OR NOT THEY SHALL WEAR WILSONIA GARMENTS. IT IS JUST AS REASONABLE TO ASK A COMMON TINKER TO MAKE YOU A GOLD WATCH, OR AN IDIOT TO SOLVE A MATHEMATICAL PROBLEM, AS TO ASK PRACTICING PHYSICIANS THEIR OPINION AS TO THE VALUE OF THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING. AND YET THIS INVENTION IS DESTINED TO OVERTHROW ALL FORMER METHODS OF TREATING DISEASE, AND OUR CHILDREN WILL WONDER HOW THEIR PARENTS COULD HAV BEEN SO HUMBUGGED AS TO POISON THEMSELVS WITH NOXIOUS DRUGS. PHYSICIANS THEMSELVS WHO HAV ADVANCED IN LIFE KNOW VERY WELL THAT MEDICIN IS A MISTAKE.

We hav in Brooklyn cases of diseases cured that hav been given over by the very best physicians, so called, in the city of Brooklyn. In the testimonies given below you hav the names of five Brooklyn physicians who had given over the patient to die.
Read these testimonials and then let these physicians answer why they fail to cure. Read Dr. Mansfield's evidence; also the evidence of Peter Lehlback, of Jersey City, whom fifty physicians of New Jersey and New York gave over as incurable. Let these doctors explain why they failed to cure after four years of medical practice, costing that poor man $15,000. And yet the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, which they dared condemn, are all sufficient to cure in two months.

I WILL GIV ANY PHYSICIAN IN BROOKLYN $5,000 IF HE CAN DISPROVE ALL I SAY IN REFERENCE TO THE VALUE OF THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM IN TREATING DISEASE, AND WILL ALSO UNDERTAKE TO CURE NINE-TENTHS OF ALL HIS INCURABLES, FREE OF CHARGE, PROVIDED HE REGISTERS THE NAMES OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME.

I will also giv any patient $5,000 who has worn my goods in quantity and time as I direct and has not received all the benefit I promised.

Read the following among the many testimonies given as to the virtues of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING:

HÆMATEMESIS.

[Bleeding from mucous membrane of Throat and Stomach.]

This almost seems incredible. But, nevertheless, this patient has come under the personal observation of Dr. Thayer, as well as all the others who have addressed their letters to him, and he affirms the truth of all they claim.

BROOKLYN, April 30, 1881.

DR. THAYER, My Dear Sir: I was first taken sick about the 15th of February, 1880. My first attack was like this: I coughed up two or three mouthfuls of blood, when I called a physician, who prescribed for hemorrhage from the lungs. I recovered slightly. Three weeks after I was awakened in the night with a cough, finding my mouth full of blood. Continued to spit blood for two days before it could be controled, which left me very weak. Recovered just enough to get around again in a very weakened condition.
Whenever I would stoop to pick up anything the blood would come up into my mouth.
Drs. Shirwell and McEvette both declared that I could never recover again. From July, 1880, to September 29, 1880, I was occasionally spitting up blood. Was suddenly taken sick one night while in the street. This attack of bleeding continued for twenty-four days. Spitting? No; I should better describe it by saying vomiting up blood with every cough. Dr. Sheppard was called in and said it was not possible for me to liv till spring—that I shouldn't live till April, 1881. Dr. Dower said he had done for me all he could. Dr. Carreau said one of my lungs was gone—THAT I COULD NOT RECOVER.
Early in March, 1881, I gave up the doctors in disgust. Upon the 21st of March, 1881, the "WILSONIA" appliances were put on me while I was in bed, as I was too weak to leave the same. Four days before this time, I—also my friends—thought I was dying.
Upon the 26th of March, 1881, I felt strong enough to get up and dress myself for the first time in three months. Then upon April 8, 1881, I was strong enough to ride two miles and call upon Mr. Wilson.
Now, three weeks since that time, I feel strong enough to WALK THAT DISTANCE. I have had no HEMORRHAGES since I put on the Appliances, and feel my strength growing better and better each day; in fine, I feel stronger and better than I have since I was first taken sick. Yours respectfully,
MICHAEL MARRION,
458 Third avenue, Brooklyn.

DR. THAYER, Dear Sir: It was about eighteen years ago that I was first attacked with sciatica, which developed into chronic rheumatism. I hav employed allopathy, homeopathy, electricity, and, in fact, ALL PATHYS. Hav employed the best medical skill in Brooklyn and Troy, New York, but they never cured me.
I commenced to wear the "WILSONIA" just before the holidays [but had no faith in them], with this result: I am stronger, sleep better, hav a better appetite, have increased in flesh and weight, feel better, AM BETTER. Have slept on hop pillows, and done almost everything for my previous nervous prostration, all of which I hav no need for now since wearing the "WILSONIA" Garments. Yours truly,
MRS. JANE SCOTT,
332 Clinton street, Brooklyn.

We place our Electro Magnetic Appliance on the body, and we succeed in influencing the internal organs, tissues, fluids, etc., by acting directly on the arterial blood, which absorbs a due amount of the magnetic force, thus invigorating the whole system, there being no cell or tissue unpenetrated by the blood. It is impossible to estimate the number of persons who lose their life from a neglect of the conditions necessary for its preservation.

NASAL CATARRH AND OBESITY.

BROOKLYN, May 30, 1881.

PROFESSOR WILSON, Dear Sir: All my life long I hav sufferred from nasal catarrh. Three months ago you persuaded me to wear your Magnetic Clothing. The offensiv disease is nearly eradicated, and I can read aloud, sing, or go up and down stairs with comparativ ease—something I hav not done in years without weariness. I was also annoyed with an excess of fat. Much of this has abated, and I hav gained a proportionate degree of muscular strength. I measure over three inches less around the body—below the waist—since wearing your Garments.
I supposed that during the warm weather they would be burdensome. On the contrary, I am as comfortable as the present oppressiv heat will permit any one to be in ordinary dress. MRS. E. G. CHIPMAN,
7 Bond street.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

[CASE OF PROFESSOR HATCH SMITH.]

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.
Desirous of knowing what Dr. Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom sufferiug humanity has a FRIEND.

THE FAR-FAMED "WILSONIA."

moves grandly on, conquering and to conquer every form of disease known to men. It triumphs over even the most complicated forms within the short space of ten or twelve months. Read the following glowing tribute from the ready pen of the world-renowned Dr. Mansfield, of New York. It was received to-day:

61 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET, N. Y., April 9, 1881.

DEAR WILSON: I am pleased to inform you that I am quite well from the use of your appliances. Fifteen days since I could not walk more than a quarter of a mile without resting. To-day I can walk three miles without fatiguing me in the least. I only wish that those who suffer as I did could know the efficacy of the "WILSONIA" as I do.
Mrs. Mansfield has been and now is under the care of a celebrated physician, and up to yesterday has been suffering from debility attended with much pain. Last evening I proposed to take my magnetic suit and put it upon her. She consented, and had not it upon her body over ten minutes before she acknowledged she was free from pain. She slept well all night, without experiencing the slightest pain whatever. I regret I hav not two suits, but I will put mine on her again to-night. I dare not go without it myself during the day time. Several ladies hav called on Mrs. M. this morning, and her theme is the "WILSONIA."
I hav sent your representativ on Broadway several customers already, and in every case I tell them you MUST DRESS them as you DEEM prudent. I hav two more on the "anxious seat" that will be converted soon. I hope to send you a $1,000 worth of customers this year.
God bless you, dear WILSON, for what you hav done and are doing for suffering humanity.
Respectfully, J. V. MANSFIELD.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

(The patient taken off from crutches.)

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

MY DIFFICULTY IS THAT MANY PERSONS WILL BECOME ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, WILL SWALLOW MEDICIN ENOUGH TO FLOAT A STEAMSHIP, AND RUB IN LINIMENTS AND OINTMENTS ENOUGH TO TAN THE SKIN TILL IT BECOMES LIKE THE SAIL OF A SHIP; AND THEN, HEARING OF MY MARVELOUS CURES, WILL EXPECT, ON PUTTING ON MY GOODS, TO JUMP INTO NEW LIFE IN TWO OR THREE MONTHS. THIS IN MOST CASES IS AN IMPOSSIBILITY, AND PERSONS GOVERNED BY SUCH EXPECTATIONS HAD BETTER NOT WASTE THEIR TIME OR MY OWN IN CALLING UPON ME,

FRIENDS OF THE SICK POOR OF BROOKLYN,

Enforce your physicians and the Charity Commissioners of Brooklyn to accept my offer to them in your behalf.
I renew it here as follows:

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

MULTIFORM DISEASE CLASSIFIED,

And the range of price for the "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits warranted to effect a cure in every case, when the suit is worn continuously for the space of twelve months—frequently will do this in half that time.

All forms of PULMONARY DISEASE, such as Phthisis Pulmonalis, or Consumption, Bronchial Hemorrhage, Pulmonary Hemorrhage, Croupous Pneumonia, Catarrhal Pneumonia, Induration, or Hardening of the Lung, Bronchial Asthma, Tussis Convulsiver, or Whooping Cough, Inflammation of the Pleura, or Pleurisy, Hydro-Thorax, or Water in the Chest, Pneumo-Thorax, or Air in the Chest, Epitaxis, or Bleeding from the Nose.
The above forms of disease require "Wilsonia" Magnetic suits which aggregate in cost from $38.50 to $73.50, according to the precise character of the disease and condition of the patient. These same conditions govern or determin the quantity of goods and their aggregate cost in every case mentioned in the following classes:
All forms of Cardiac, or HEART DISEASE, require magnetic suits ranging in price from $38.50 to $73.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of DIGESTION, such as Diphtheritic Inflammation of the Pharynx, Syphilitic Affections of the Pharynx, Inflammation of the Œsophagus, Stricture of the Œsophagus, Acute Gastric Catarrh, or Acute Catarrh of the Stomach, Gastritis, or Inflammation of the Stomach, Carcinoma, or Cancer of the Stomach, Hematomesis, or Hemorrhage of the Stomach, Dyspepsia, Scrofulous and Tuberculous Diseases of the Intestins and Mesenteric Glands, Colic, Gastric Fever, Neuralgia of the Stomach and Intestins, Peritonitis.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $93.50.

Epilepsy, or Falling Sickness, Eclampsia Infantum, Hysteria, Catalepsy, Hypochondriasis.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $150.00.
All forms of DISEASE of the SKIN, such as Eczema and its several varieties, require suits costing from $48.50 to $73.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of LOCOMOTION, such as Rheumarthrisis Acute, or Flying Gout, Acute Articular Rheumatism, Chronic Articular Rheumatism, Deformities of the Joints, Gout, Progressiv Muscular Atrophy.
The above reqnire magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $200.00.
All forms of ACUTE and CHRONIC INFECTIOUS DISEASE, such as Measles, Scarlet Fever, Small Pox, Chicken Pox, Typhus Fever, Typhoid Fever, Relapsing Fever, Intermittent Fever, Dysentery, Syphilis, Congenital and Hereditary.
The above require magnetic suits costing $93.00.
All DISORDERS OF NUTRITION which do not depend upon Infection, such as Chlorisis, Scrofula, Diabetes (both varieties), Scarbutus, or Scurvy, etc.

The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $68.50.
HERNIA requires Magnetic Appliances costing from $53.50 to $93.50.
VARICOSE VEINS require Magnetic Appliances costing from $58.50 to $108.50.

N. B.—When "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits are ordered to be forwarded by mail or express [they should go by express wherever practicable], do not neglect to state the size of head, of the waist, the wrist, and length of the foot of the person for whom they are ordered. All checks and post-office orders should be made payable to William Wilson, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable! DOCTOR FELLOWS You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.
Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:
"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."
The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."
Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.
Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.
This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

Gems of Thought.

VAIN transitory Splendor! Could not all
Reprieve the the tottering mansion from its fall?
Obscure it sinks, nor shall it more impart
An hour's importance to the poor man's heart.
—Goldsmith's Deserted Village.

I HAV no propensity to envy any one, least of all the rich and great; but if I am disposed to this weakness the subject of my envy would be a healthy young man in the full possession of his health and faculties, going forth in a morning to work for his wife and children, or bringing them home his wages at night.—Paley.

EVEN now what affections the violet awakes;
What fond little islands twice seen in their lakes
Can the wild water-lily restore;
What landscapes I read in the primrose's looks,
And what pictures of pebbled and mirrowy brooks
In the vetches that tangled the shore.
—Campbell.

THAT governments exist only for the good of the people appears to be the simplest and most obvious of all truths. Yet history proves that it is one of the most recondite. We can scarcely wonder that it should be so seldom present to the minds of rulers, when we see how slowly and through how much suffering nations arrive at a knowledge of it —Macaulay.

I CALL a man remarkable who becomes a true workman in this vineyard of the Highest. Be his work that of palace building and kingdom founding or only of delving or ditching, to me it is no matter, or next to none. All human work is transitory small in itself, contemptible. Only the worker thereof and the spirit that dwelt in him is significant.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

THE star of the unconquered will,
He rises in my breast,
Serene and resolute and still
And calm and self-possessed.

Oh fear not in a world like this,
And thou shalt know ere long,
Know how sublime a thing it is
To suffer and be strong. —Longfellow.

FOR forms of government let fools contest;
Whate'er is best administered is best;
For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.
In faith and hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is charity;
All must be false that thwart this one great end,
And all of God that bless mankind or mend.
—Pope.

TOLERATION is only a recent discovery. We hav ceased to burn men; it is now necessary to persuade them. The age of martyrdom, like that of miracles, is past. We are not shot or pinned to a stake or broken alive on the wheel as in by-gone days; and yet we suffer by isolation, by misrepresentation, by ridicule, and by blame. Courage is as necessary as ever for those who would hold by the innate consciousness of the truth.—Smith's Duty.

A THOUSAND men may enjoy the pleasure derived from a picture, a symphony, or a poem, without lessening the happiness of the most devoted connoisseur. The investigation of nature is an infinit pasture ground where all may graze and where the more that bite the larger the grass grows, the sweeter is its flavor, and the more it nourishes. If I love a friend it is no damage to me, but rather a pleasure, if all the world also love him and think of him as highly as I do.—Huxley.

MANY bigoted Christians hav acted in obedience to conscience and hav committed great crimes. Torquemada obeyed his conscience and burned heretics alive. Calvin obeyed his conscience and put Servetus to death. The Scotch parliament conscientiously thought that all Roman Catholics should be executed. Protestants obeyed their convictions when they flogged Quakers at the East Jail. Christian conscience must learn to to giv liberty of conscience to others.—National Reformer.

TWO good meals a day are plenty in the winter, and especially so for those who are indoors most of the time. Very few of us eat too little or too seldom. But few kinds of food should be eaten at one meal. The more kinds of dishes one has on the table at a time the more temptation one has to overeat in desire to taste of some portion of them all. Woman's work could be greatly simplified were the world suddenly to become hygienic in diet. It would be an immense gain in time, as well as health and good spirits. Few realize how much depends upon health as to the good nature and high spirits of individuals.—Elmina D. Slenker.

HOW men and women of common humanity, who believe that God is love, can hold a faith that must condemn to everlasting misery nine-tenths of the human race, is more than I can understand. If they said that God loves one-tenth part of mankind and hates the rest, then we could understand them. But what kind of love is that which would torture a man through all the eternities for not assenting to a score of contradictory dogmas. I cannot comprehend how people are in earnest who preach those things. The whole scheme seems to me a farce, and it is really so ridiculous that the best thing one can do is to laugh at it, as it is a lie black as the heart of midnight, and deserves at the hands of all honest men their severest condemnation.—L. K. Washburn.

THE highest intellects, like the tops of mountains, are the first to catch the dawn of progress. They are bright, while the level plain is still in darkness. But soon the light, which at first illuminated only the loftiest eminences, descends on the plain and penetrates to the deepest valley. First come hints, then fragments of systems, then defectiv systems, then complete and harmonious systems. The sound opinion, held for a time by one bold speculator, becomes the opinion of a small minority, of a strong minority, of a majority of mankind. Thus the great progress goes on, till schoolboys laugh at the jargon which imposed on Bacon, till country rectors condemn the illiberality and intolerance of Sir Thomas Moore.—Macaulay.

Odds and Ends.

A TRUE philosopher never argues. He mentally concludes that his opponent is an ass, and keeps his mouth shut.

A MEDICAL journal of Munich says that diphtheria caught by kissing is likely to assume a much severer form than if the disease were contracted or the contagion imparted in some other way. This should be a warning to married men and hired girls.

"How do you like my spring clothes?" asked Leander. "Pretty well," replied Hero, doubtfully, and then added, "but I think I should like you better in a walking suit." He sat wrapped in silent thought for about five minutes, and then got up and walked slowly away in the suit he had on.

She sat down at the piano and sang: "Darling, I am growing old."

SHE was young and beautiful; he was old and ugly. He took her hand and squeezed it tenderly, and then she put out her tongue at him. Then he laid his hand gently on her breast. She was eighteen and she was seventy, but still it was an affection of the heart. Oh, yes it was. Her heart was affected, and he was a doctor, trying to see how far the mischief had gone.

JOSIAR.

Things has come to a pretty pass
The whole wide country over,
When every married woman has
To hav a friend or lover;
It ain't the way that I was raised,
An' I hain't no desire
To hav some feller pokin' round,
Instead of my Josiar.

I never kin forget the day
That we went out a'walkin',
An' sot down on the river bank
An' kep' on hours a'talkin';
He twisted up my apron string
An' folded it together,
An' said he thought for harvest time
'Twas cur'us kind o' weather.

The sun went down as we sot there,
Josiar seemed uneasy,
An' mother she began to call,
"Loweezy! O Loweezy!"
An' then Josiar spoke right up,
As I was just a'startin,
An' said "Loweezy, what's the use
Of us two ever partin'?"

It kind o' took me by surprise,
An' yet I knew 'twas comin'—
I'd heard it all the summer long
In every wild bee's hummin';
I'd studied out the way I'd act,
But Lor'! I couldn't do it;
I meant to hide my love from him,
But seems as if he knew it.
An' lookin' down into my eyes
He must a'seen the fire,
An' ever since that hour I've loved
An' worshiped my Josiar.

I can't tell what the women mean
Who let men fool around 'em,
Believin' all the nonsense that
They only say to sound 'em;
I know, for one, I've never seen
The man that I'd admire
To hav a'hangin' after me
Instead of my Josiar.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 8. No. 29. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, July 16, 1881. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

BISHOP STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, cautions his clergy against the use of the revised New Testament in the public services of the church. He says that no clergyman is at liberty to use any other version of the Bible than the "King James" which was in 1828 adopted by the General Convention.

THE Canandagua papers hav a disgusting account of the conduct of an influential prominent church-member, Austin Persons, over three score and ten years of age, for taking liberties unfit to be named with a little girl under ten years of age, named Gerty C. Adams. The girl is an orphan, and this saintly old Christian did his best to debauch and ruin her.

ABOUT two weeks ago, as Mr. W. T. Kent was walking through Cedar Creek Swamp, he found a buzzard's nest. He took one of the eggs to the store of T. W. Kent & Son, and put it in the care of his brother, Mr. H. V. Kent, who put it in the show-case, where it remained until last Thursday, when, to the surprise of all, a young buzzard was hatched from the egg.—Wrightville Recorder.

THE gratifying intelligence comes from Indiana, through the columns of the religious press, that a new fence has been erected around the parsonage of the Methodist Episcopal church at Owensville. The former fence had been a good one in its day, but had served its time, having stood for twenty years. A coat of paint, color not mentioned, has been applied to the Owensville parsonage within and without.

VERY few of those who hav used the expression, "He's a brick," know that it comes from Plutarch. An embassador from Epirus was shown by King Agesilaus of Sparta over his capital, and expressed surprise at the absence of walls and fortifications. "Come to-morrow," quoth the king, "and I will show you our walls." On the morrow he showed him an array of ten thousand men, remarking, "Each one is a brick."

IT has been remarked frequently that not only particular kinds of crime seem to go in waves, like an epidemic, but strange accidents and other unusual occurrences show a like tendency. A curious illustration is now furnished. While the President is agreeably surprising his physicians by the favorable nature of his symptoms, a boy in Bayonne who had a bullet shot straight through his brain is causing equal astonishment by showing indications of getting well.

THE astronomers are uncertain whether the comet has split in two or not. Prof. Stone, with the fine telescope of the Cincinnati Observatory, which did splendid work in the hands of the lamented Gen. Mitchel, says he saw it divided on Wednesday night, the 6th inst. Mr. Rock, who was looking at the comet with the giant telescope in Washington on the same night, says it was not divided, but that a band of light extended backward from the nucleus, and near the end of the band was a bright spot. He thinks the Cincinnati observers may hav seen the spot but not the connecting band, and so hav taken the bright spot for a separated portion of the nucleus. The astronomers all agree, however, that it would not be very surprising if the comet should split.

THE Germans of Indianapolis complain bitterly of the interference with their mode of passing Sunday to which they are exposed in that city and in its vicinity. They like to hav music and take their lager and coffee in the open air with their families on Sunday afternoons, or in gardens or halls attached to lager beer saloons, as they hav been accustomed to do in Germany. Within the city, however, these enjoyments are interfered with by the temperance people and the police, and if they go to gardens or other resorts outside of the city limits they are attacked by bands of rowdies, who take advantage of the same time to rove around with an eye to fighting and mischief. In the city, say the Germans, the police interfere when not wanted, and outside they refuse to interfere when they are wanted. They therefore call for organization to resist this condition of affairs, which they pronounce intolerable.

CHARLES J. GUITEAU, theologian, politician, and would-be assassin of the President, joined Plymouth church in 1857, and his name is No. 2,422 upon the rolls of the church. He remained in the church until 1859, when his connection was discontinued. It is understood that he took a letter with him when he went away, and it is thought that it was the one upon which he was admitted to the Calvary Baptist church in this city, of which the Rev. Mr. McArthur is pastor. Some of the attendants of Plymouth church recalled him to mind when they saw his picture, and say that he was in the habit of speaking at Friday-evening meetings. His talk was as rational as any Christian's, and nothing is remembered about it that pointed to insanity. Guiteau was admitted to the church by letter.

THIS time it is the Rev. Carl Heinrich, of Woodhaven, L. I., and the woman is Mrs. Cripendorf, wife of the Sunday-school superintendent and a former warm friend of the guilty theologian. About two years ago Heinrich was installed pastor of the Methodist church at the above place, and soon after began an intimacy with Mrs. Cripendorf, which she has confessed to her husband was highly improper for a man to sustain to a woman not his wife. Last May Heinrich was suspended from his charge because of his tender relations to Mrs. Cripendorf, and last Wednesday he was arrested on a warrant obtained by the injured husband, who charges him with assaulting him with a shovel on the occasion of an accidental meeting. Mr. Cripendorf says he retaliated by firing one shot at him, when the minister ran away. Heinrich says he is a Joseph and the woman a Potiphar's wife, but when the trial for assault comes on the little community of Woodhaven will probably hear some racy evidence.

THE movement in the New York Chamber of Commerce to raise $250,000 for the President's family is one of those proceedings at which to look with reason rather than impulse. It was engineered by Mr. Cyrus W. Field and Mr. Jay Gould, and under excitement and the duress or unreflection of the occasion, the initial subscription ran up to $40,000. Other subscriptions are solicited, and "they should be sent to Cyrus W. Field." Now, if the President dies, Congress will doubtless follow the precedents in the case of the widows of Messrs. Harrison, Taylor, and Lincoln, and vote Mrs. Garfield the salary for the whole of the remaining term, and then, aside from the fact of the sufficiency of the sum—$200,000—if citizens want, in that event, to more than double it, no suspicion of interested motivs can be indulged. But should the President get well, the question of whether he could afford to let his family accept the money would be one of importance. We all know that Messrs. Field, Gould, and others want the government of the United States to be ten times as generous to their subsidy schemes as they will ever be to any of its Presidents. The contribution is not to be regarded, from the standpoint of their business and their character, to be so much of a gift as it is a sheer speculation. Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Quincy Adams, Jackson, Buchanan, Lincoln, and Johnson refused all gifts, great or small, while Presidents, on the ground that they could not afford to be under obligation, real or implied, while holding an office which givs them power over the fortunes of every donor. This may be old-fashioned, but there are persons who believe it is right. We would discourage and criticise no generous impulse, but impulse is a bad barter for action, and principles are not to be lost sight of under any circumstances. Could President Garfield maintain that reputation of disinterestedness which is as important as the reality of it, if he had to pass on schemes to dower these donors with largess out of the public treasury?—Albany Argus.

THE Elmira Telegram of recent date contains a full account of a serious difficulty between two reverends named respectivly Lewis and Shurtliff, the former charging Shurtliff with circulating stories to the effect that he was an immoral man, and had alienated the affections of the wife of one David F. Kirkland, whom he induced to accompany him to an obscure town in Cayuga county and procured for her there a temporary stopping-place at the home of one Lokey, where he frequently visited her, finally removing Mrs. Kirkland to the town of Hartford, and procuring rooms, sharing them with her, representing that the lady was a poor widow from Ithaca by the name of Seaman, and at other times introducing her as a relativ of his. The Rev. Shurtliff says these things coming to his knowledge so well backed by responsible parties he considered it his duty as a Christian minister to warn his flock against Christian fellowship with Lewis. It was shown in the evidence that Lewis is a widower with children, and that, contemplating taking as his housekeeper the discarded wife of another man, asked Shurtliff's advice on the point whether or not it would be best for him to make such a selection. Mr. Shurtliff's advice was to take the woman for housekeeper and other duties. Things went on swimmingly with these two pious Methodists until Lewis went over to the Presbyterians, and then they became like the famed Kilkenny cats, and finally resorted to the majesty of the law to settle which was the better fellow of the two. The judge and jury, being Christians, gave Lewis twenty-five dollars damages, which Shurtliff thought so small that it amounted to a corroboration of all he had charged.

LIGHTNING'S FREAKS.—Joseph Robertson was driving in his buggy when a thunderbolt struck the horse and killed him instantly. When the horse dropped, Robertson's momentum carried him out of the vehicle and clear over the head of the fallen animal.—Mrs. Crane, of Alton, Ill., while riding with her daughter and grandchild, was instantly killed by lightning. The bolt threw her out on one side and her daughter out the other, while the infant, who rode between them, was unharmed.—In the course of the funeral services over the body of F. S. Barnes in the Methodist church, Forsyth, Ga., lightning struck the steeple, but the rod conducted it to the ground. The sun was shining brightly, and the event created a profound sensation in the congregation.—R. T. Barksdale's house in Warrenton, Ga., was recently struck by lightning. A kerosene lamp was hurled from the mantel through a door into an adjoining room, and the oil scattered over the floor. Although a cloud of smoke prevailed and a sheet of fire seemed to spread through the house, yet nothing caught, not even the oil.—A portion of the house of Frederick Ditman in the outskirts of Milwaukee, Wis., was demolished by lightning and Mrs. Ditman was killed while at work in the pantry. The kitchen stove was torn to pieces, and every utensil twisted out of shape; the furniture in three rooms was battered, and all the locks and hinges torn from their fastenings. The only mark on the dead woman's person was a blue spot on her temple.—Several men and boys took refuge from a thunder storm in B. P. Berson's barn near Baltimore. A few minutes afterward the barn was struck by lightning. John Harmon and his little boy were instantly killed. The clothing of Harmon was torn into shreds and the hair was burned off his head. Another man was paralyzed in both of his legs, and another boy was injured fatally. Several of the other persons in the barn were stunned by the shock, and lay unconscious for several hours. The barn was burnt.

News of the Week.

GRISCOM completed his forty-five days' fast last Tuesday.

THE khedive and his ministers are trying to abolish slavery in Egypt.

ELEVEN hundred and forty-four deaths were reported in this city last week.

A WOMAN of sixty-five and a youth of twenty-two were married in this city last week.

SIXTY thousand volunteer troops were reviewed by Queen Victoria at Windsor, Eng., on the 9th.

JULY 10th was the hottest day at St. Louis, Mo., of which there is any record. The thermometer registered 102.2.

FRANCE is sending troops and ironclads to Tunis. Heavy engagements between the French and insurgent troops are reported.

Two men were killed and three badly injured by the explosion of a boiler at Barrett & Nephew's dyeing works on Staten Island on the 10th.

THE Cincinnati Enquirer says that on the night of July 8th, in Heard county, Ga., Jesse Waldrop was burnt to death for outraging a woman, the young and beautiful wife of Dr John Mitchell.

No senator has as yet been elected at Albany. The Half-Breed Republicans held a caucus and put Lapham and Miller in nomination, but the Stalwarts refuse to vote for them, and the end to the disgraceful scramble appears to be as far off as ever.

OVER fifty people were killed by the caving in of a church roof at Mateo, Mexico, on the 8th. The congregation were mostly women. The church was not completed, and twenty workmen who were finishing the roof were crushed by the terrible fall.

THE labor reformers of this city hav organized a club for the purpose of discussing the question started by Truth as to who gets the money earned by the laborer. It is called the "Who-Is-the-Somebody Club." The temporary officers are J. B. Gibbs, chairman; H. E. Sharpe, secretary; Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, treasurer.

GEN. DAHLGREN, brother of the late Admiral Dahlgren, who invented the gun used "by Christians to blow Christian brains into eternal froth," has been lecturing against Col. Ingersoll. At the close of his hour's talk, which was heard by nearly a hundred persons, he gave utterance to this sentiment, which is undoubtedly Christian: "There should be condign punishment for such men as he on earth and in eternity. All men should bear a hand, and women with their garter-strings should lash him through the world."

BRADLAUGH has sent word to Gladstone that as Parliament has not passed the Oaths bill he will present himself at the House and demand to be sworn in. The speaker says he will hav him arrested if he does. A petition of Mr. Bradlaugh's constituents in his favor was not allowed to be presented, but one against him, gotten up by the church party, was presented and placed on file. The pious people of England seem to be willing to commit any dishonest and mean act to keep this able Atheist out of the seat to which has been twice elected.

THE President continues to improve slowly, and there is an even chance that he will survive the murderous assault. Cyrus W. Field has started a fund of a quarter of a million dollars, to be presented to Mrs. Garfield, the most of which is already subscribed. Guiteau, the would-be assassin, is carefully kept in jail, being allowed to see no one except the jailors and district attorney, and not allowed to read the papers. He was at one time a member of Beecher's church, is very pious, and spends much of his time reading the Bible. He says God told him to shoot the President.

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XIV.

"I was carried away in spite of myself with the train of thoughts of my stoic philosopher," said Abbé Dillon. "I became aware of a hitherto unknown sentiment within myself. Earthly possessions, with their splendor and charms for the senses, vanished in the feeling of my true self. I became aware that they did not belong to me, and I not to them. The universe appeared new. I beheld it from an unimagined point of view. Alamontada remained silent, as if he had discovered my frame of mind; as if he wanted to giv me time to re-collect myself under this strange horizon. It was not necessary. The spirit sees in every truth its home and its property; only error is to it a strange country.

"'O Alamontada,' cried I, 'now I comprehend it, how thou canst die with tranquil soul, and harmlessly canst await for thy spirit to act the further part on another stage! Yet I confess to thee that it would be well for man if the veil before the future life were raised just a little; if the ordainer of the universe had in some way revealed himself, that no one could fall into the disease of doubt concerning that.'

"'How, dear sir,' said Alamontada; 'you believe that it would be better for mankind? To what man? To the immature, to the one that is still clinging to sensuality? No, dear sir, that one would be just as well and just as badly off as now. He is not made happy by the spiritual, but by that which springs from the earthly. He is blessed by the feeling of agreeable superabundance, wherein he may liv, the feeling of glory, of public esteem, of friendship, of tender love, of beauty, of the useful and the like.

"'To the immature man the charm of the power of imagination replaces for a time what is lacking in him of revelation. He is on that account not more unhappy. You see how merrily he dances through his life as long as sickness, mistakenness, poverty, enmity, or any other sensual evil does not trouble him.

"'But the educated man in the state of his maturity demands no higher revelations about the sacred mysteries of the universe than he already possesses. He cannot wish them.'

"'He cannot wish them?' asked I. 'I do not understand thee.'

"'He cannot,' answered the philosopher, 'because he would not wish the impossible. Not to the senses the godhead could reveal itself, but to the spirit. It did so while it has built ourselvs that the same must think and believe it from necessity. It did so while it as primitiv power filled the universe with its phenomena, which we perceive by means of the sensual organs. While the creator, as it were, through the mouth of our reason speaks to us, "I am," and in the same moment unfurls before our eyes the phenomena of his wonderful power, extinguishing all doubts —doubts which never arise from reason, but from fancy and through experiences of the sensual world.

"'Once more, I repeat to you, all throughout the whole of nature, all that we possess and experience, all that we discover within us, and all that we know —all, say I, limits the spirit finally to itself, leads it with gentle power to independence. This we must look upon as the last aim of our acts, as our destiny, as our highness.

"'True it is, this earthly life is full of imaginary evil; nothing is lasting therein; all changes, and we are carried away by an irresistible flood of undesired events and fates. But let us not complain about that so loudly. Even this is a hint from the creator that we elevate ourselvs above the earthly and finite, and should find our salvation and our goal, not in this, but in our own self. The spirit of man is not the property of the sensual; it also has no other property than itself alone. Even the organs of sense with which he as man for a time is connected remain not for it.

"'True it is that we of the millions of objects which float about us in the universe comprehend but few; that we only know the objects, what they are in relation to us, but not what they may be for themselvs. But on that account we will not be frightened. For that we always dwell upon our imagination, that we are always confined to our own inner world, this is the sacred proof of our worth, of our highness, of our independence as spirits. We behold ourselvs in not one single connection which degrades us to subordination to a being foreign to ourselvs, or even suffered to imagin this degradation. We stand alone, but we stand for ourselvs in the unlimited realm of creation. We walk through the wonderful phenomena, and are touched and left by them; and in the stormy drama our spirit awakens and recognizes itself, and develops its power, and becomes what it should be, a holy, self-acting being, connected with a strange formation of matter which we call body, our feet, as it were, walking in the dust, our heads touching divinity.

"'Yes, I am an independent being, created for myself, and while everything only leads me back to myself, and the whole surrounding nature guarantees my being, and even thereby teaches me to know my worth, my highness in the succession of things, I behold in the independence of myself the title deed of my eternity.

"'May then the sensual man tremble when what is earthly about him falls to pieces, and he fancies to lose himself. That which thinks in this corpse is not dust, is not phenomenon, like the dust, but a primitiv power, which itself produces phenomena. It lasts, it works further. Nonsense it would be to say the powers of the universe are lost out of the universe, or the world could be lost out of itself.

"'The slightest self-observation teaches me that my self-acting I is of a different nature from the appearance that I call my corpse. May this become dissolved into the matters, moving and enlivening powers, out of which producing nature put it together, my I continues in its manhood and survives the change of phenomena.

"'Soon, oh, soon this dust falls apart,' continued Alamontada, and his eyes beamed brighter toward heaven. 'Be it so. I stand an indestructible part in the circle of the order of the universe. The spirit's wonderful realm is my home. In it dwell beings like myself; there my brethren!

"'Much, much hav I suffered in my human nature. But well for me! In these storms my power ripened quicker. I hav finished the strife, and in the depths of misery I felt unspeakable happiness; despised, and in the eyes of humanity an outcast, I felt my nobility, which no human sentence can erase; the bench of the galley was my school-bench; languishing on the glowing coasts of Africa, I became aware of the riches I possessed that could not be taken away from me. Oh, how fortunate am I! At the end of a painful race-course I look back with pleasure, for all thorns now bloom so beautifully, they that I once hated because they wounded me.

"'And thou,' continued Alamontada, and a glorification, as it were, floated about his face, while I sat there in reverence, as before the dying bed of a saint, and my eyes overflowed with tears—'O thou lofty, unknown, most sacred, through which I was called into existence, I am thine, and thine eternally. High hast thou placed me in the order of thy beings, O thou inexpressible one! For I dare imagin thee, dare think thee; thou thyself speakest of thee within me. O father-spirit! father-spirit! I am still human, and therefore of child-like sense, and the thought of thee is accompanied by the warm feeling, therefore I speak to thee. My talk is child's lisping to the father-spirit—human thanks! How happy am I that I am! In thee I liv. Through thee I elevate myself, and glide from one round of thy all to the other. O father-spirit——'

"Here his speech gradually became lower and more indistinct. It seemed as if his spirit was shaking off the fetters of words in order to ascend in swift flight. A wonderful rapture beamed in his features. Now and then his lips quivered, as in low prayer, as if the tired body would accompany the spirit in its devotion, in its thanks to God."

SOME OBSERVATIONS UPON THAT HORRIBLE AND CRUEL ORDINANCE IN DEVIL-WORSHIP, NAMELY, BLOODY SACRIFICES AND BURNT-OFFERINGS. BY THE VERY REV. EVAN DAVIES (MYFGR MORGANWG) D. D., L.L.D., ARCH DRUID OF GREAT BRITAIN.

TRANSLATED BY MORION B. C.

When we compare our Druidic idea of Hü leading his people to the White Isle to their idea of Joshua leading them into Canaan, and the methods of acquiring the Promised Land, it is not difficult to decide who hav the best claim to be considered God's people—the people who claimed to hav possessed their land without weapons or force, or a people who stole their land by a Power of Darkness, and who to-day are homeless wanderers upon the face of the earth, who by command of their deity attacked a nation of industrious husbandmen and shepherds, whose chief city was Salem, whose king was King of Righteousness and Prince of Peace and Priest of the Most High God.

Once located, they were a continual menace to the surrounding nations, plundering, warring, slaying them, man, woman, and child, without excuse or showing mercy, simply because thus saith the Lord of Abram, Isaac, and Jacob, who swore that they should possess the land, and because the inhabitants worshiped strange gods (the difference simply being that they were named differently, according to the various dialects of the country), and lest they, if left alive, should seduce them to follow after their gods, thinking that probably their creed might be superior to their own. (Thou shalt make no covenant with them or their gods. They shall not dwell in thy land, lest they make thee sin against me, for if thou serve their god it will surely be a snare unto thee. —Exodus xxiii, 32, 33.)

As the gods Baal, Moloch, Dagon, Chemosh, etc., are simply the same idea of the Powers of Darkness, and symbolic of the sun's descent into the gloom of winter, we fail to find any justification for them, other than pure malice. One thing we notice. After the conquest was complete, and the land divided, with the spoils, animals, and the young maidens who had not known man, for the people's share, the gold and silver were set apart, and consecrated to the Lord, and given to his servants the priests.

The Hittites (children of Heth) were first on the list of the prescribed for destruction (But of the cities of these people which the Lord thy God doth giv thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth.—Deut. xx, 16)—a people who had by their own tradition been so kind to Abraham, their father, granting him a home and pasturage for his flocks, and a place to bury Sarah, free of cost, if the old rogue would hav accepted it. But he would insist upon paying for it, carefully weighing the money, so that he might hav a title to the land by purchase of a grave, held to be the strongest title in oriental nations. A sad day for the children of Heth!

The first command of this Jewish Lord and leader was to despoil the Egyptians by borrowing every one of their neighbor's jewels of gold and silver, while they ostensibly went three days journey into the desert. Starting out with a gigantic swindle, they hold it as a moral lesson to teach their children to this day. Later we find the priest Aaron swindling them out of their jewels, in return, on the pretense of making a calf for them to worship (Apis-Taurus). Moses became indignant, ordered the calf to be destroyed, dissolved in water, and drank (a very curious chemical feat), and then with consecrated hands ordered three thousand of the children of Israel to be slain to appease the wrath of the deity. But Aaron, his brother, the instigator of the whole affair, was allowed to go scot-free.

In Num. xvi (They and all that appertained unto them went down alive into the pit and the earth closed upon them and they perished.) we hav an example of how the innocent were made to suffer alike with the guilty, and in Deut. xxv. 17, 19 (Remember what Amalek did to thee by the way when ye were come forth out of Egypt. Thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven: thou shalt not forget it.) an illustration of how this hate and malice were kept up.

In their forty years' journey in the wilderness crimes innumerable were committed in the name of the Lord. They became rich in gold and silver and cattle plundered from the nations they encountered, and which were freely used in the fabrication of the Tabernacle. (See Exodus xxxvi to xxxix, and Num. vii. (And they brought to him offerings every morning. The people bring much more than enough for the work. So the people were restrained from bringing. And Bezaleel made the ark of shittim-wood, and overlaid it with pure gold within and without, and made a crown of pure gold to it. He cast for it four rings of gold, and he made staves of shittim-wood and overlaid them with gold. He made the mercy seat of pure gold; two cubits and a half was the length and one and a half the breadth; and two cherubims of gold, beaten out of one piece, and they spread their wings over the mercy seat. And he made the table of shittim-wood, and covered it with pure gold. And he made the breastplate foursquare, with four rows of stones, sardonyx, topaz, carbuncle, emerald, sapphire, diamond, ligure, agate, amethyst, beryl, onyx, and jasper.)

Note what was done to the five kings of Midian in the name of the Lord and by his command. And it has always been easy for the followers of this God to find an excuse to plunder weaker nations in his name. Num. xxi is a fit illustration of the horribly sickening sentiments of these devil-worshipers.

See the treatment of Og, king of Bashan (Deut. ii, 31-37). See how the inhabitants of Jericho were made to suffer (Josh. vi, 19-21). And Ai was smitten (Josh. viii, 24-29). In all these cases the gold and silver were reserved for the Lord.

They did all this with an easy conscience, for they were fighters, and if victorious it was their God who gave them the victory; if beaten, he was offended and withdrew his hand; and thus they believed that they had a divine title to these lands. And acting upon this barbarous principle Jephthah said to the king of Ammon, "Appropriate all that Chemosh has set before thee; likewise all that the God of Israel has given us we will appropriate." (Wilt not thou possess that which Chemosh thy God giveth thee to possess? So whomsoever the Lord our God shall drive out from before us, them will we possess.—Judges xi, 21, 24.)

Really, Jehovah and Chemosh were identical, simply being the same as Jupiter Ammon (i. e. the Winged Sun) deified. In one place Chemosh is termed the Abomination of Ammon, and in another place he is symbolic of the Messiah. (But unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings.—Mal. iv, 2.)

Samuel is held forth as an example of a devout and faithful worshiper of Jehovah. Yet with what ferocity he demands the slaughter of the Amalekites, slaying their king with his own hands, simply for the memory of some slight that his forefathers had received four hundred years previous, while they were journeying in the wilderness! (And Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal. —1 Sam. xv, 33).

David also was zealous for the Lord. Mark his crimes, deceitfulness, treachery, and cruelty, notably in the case of Uriah: "Is not this Bathsheba wife of Uriah the Hittite? And David sent messengers and took her and lay with her. And Joab sent Uriah to David, and David said to Uriah, Tarry here to-day, to-morrow I will let thee depart. And he made him drunk and he went out to lie on his bed with the servants of his lord, but went not into his own house. Uriah said unto David, The ark is in the open field; shall I then go to my house to eat and drink and lie with my wife? I will not do this thing. David then wrote a letter to Joab, saying, Set Uriah in the forefront of the battle and retire from him so that he be smitten and die. And Joab assigned Uriah unto a place where he knew that valiant men were. And the men of the city went out and fought and Uriah died. . . . Say unto David Uriah is dead, and when the mourning was passed David fetched her to his house and she became his wife" (2 Sam. xi, 2, 27). And when old and effete he had to hav the fairest damsel in the land to lie with him, though he had already wives enough for any one man. (King David was old and gat no heat. So they sought for a fair damsel throughout Israel and found Abishag and brought her to the king, and she cherished and ministered to him and lay in his bosom.—1 Kings i, 1-4.) And even with his dying breath he carried his hate beyond the grave by ordering the death of the children of Zeruiah, his own nephews, and whom he had sworn to hold harmless, and who were his stanchest and truest friends while he was in adversity. This is a shining light, a man after God's own heart. (Which, God or devil?)

The Hebrew elders claim that all plundering, slaying, and rapine was by express command of Jehovah, and justify their actions upon that plea. But it is plain that this was simply a priestly delusion to maintain a hold upon an ignorant and misguided people. Not one of them ever saw this imaginary God or heard his voice. The ordinance of inquiring at the ark of the Lord was but an imitation of the Celtic custom of applying to the stone ark (Logan stone) symbolic of the womb of fate, for oracular responses. The stone ark was esteemed the chief oracle for prognosticating the future. But every command said to hav issued from the tabernacle, from Jehovah, was simply a priestly device to keep the people under control and to impel them to deeds which should inure to the benefit of the priesthood or some self-constituted prophet or leader among them. The Celtic oracles taught simply, the voice of nature is the Voice of God.

It is surprising how many learned men in Europe still believe that these Jewish myths were facts, and are ever ready to invent excuses and justify these atrocious actions of biblical characters.

Of all the gods of the East, Jehovah was the most terrible, and instigator of the greatest crimes; a god entirely in sympathy with his people; a race of murderers and thieves, cruel, barbaric, ignorant, vainglorious of themselvs while they despised everyone else.

This God, who was only a conglomerate of the sun with his various zodiacal aspects deified, a misapprehension of the astronomical ideas of that time, had for his symbols peculiarly Celtic symbols. The name was El (Haul); his symbols were the bull ŏ, the linga, Said* the ark, etc. His holidays were the sun's changes of position. His promises were the sun's promises, coin and cattle, milk and honey, and to eat of the fat of the land, and the old covenant between the sun and earth (And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head and thou shalt bruise his heel.--Gen. iii, 15. And behold I establish my covenant with you and with your seed after you. . . . I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth.—Gen. ix, 9, 13. I will establish my covenant with him and his seed after him. As for Ishmael, I hav blessed him. But my covenant I establish with Isaac.—Gen. xvii, 19, 21) was the covenant which they claimed God made with their fathers, while the promis of the New Sun Ad. On. (Celtic ad, seed; on sacrifice) was the foundation of the promised seed, the Messiah.

*The Jews claimed all the lingas in Palestine as pillars of the Lord, his Said (Deut. xxxii, 18, 21), claiming a greater antiquity for them than the linga of Baal—Siva. The linga was used like the gnomon of a dial to tell the hour, also as an oracle. Ahaz inquired at the oracle of Baal, Zebub (2 Kings, 1, 2), and there is some connection here as the dial of Ahaz, is referred to when Hezekiah seeks a response (2 Kings xx, 9, 11).

The Value of "the Book."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is not long since the papers informed us that "the Buddhist priests in Japan hav taken the Bible in the course of their study so that they can the better oppose the missionaries." Let us recommend to them the revised book, and this with the amendments of the margin and the appendix.

The pitiable manner in which "the most learned men" of England and America hav performed their self-imposed task has this qualification: they hav done some good things, and hav, in the notes, pointed out for every reader many more and better things for their successors to do. With these they hav done some quite silly things indeed; but they only did the best they could to preserve the last show of their theology. In the Lord's prayer they would "deliver us from the evil one," thus mutilating and emasculating—though by addition—the beautiful prayer, "deliver us from evil." They tell us, however, in notes, that devils are but demons, and that "those possessed of devils" were only "demoniacs." On the other hand, they hav rightly given us "life" in exchange for the absurd "soul" of Matt. xvi, 26, but leave "soul" in the margin for those who still need it.

Lo, even the marginal notes must be taken with allowance. "Hades" is indeed no longer "hell," either in the text or in the margin; but "Gehenna" is translated "hell." And Dr. Balch says, "Gehenna [rendered hell twelve times in the New Testament] is now a very pleasant place, filled with a fine orchard of olive-trees, from one of which I cut a very pretty cane." If, then, my friend should suggest that I "go to hell," I may only retort, "Get me a ticket off at Jerusalem."

The human parentage of Jesus might be adduced as a point which our revisers hav well brought out. (See Luke xi, 33 and 41). Even Dr. Roberts ("Companion to the Revised Version," p. 14 and 15) admits that "the substitution of Joseph for 'his father,' and of 'Joseph and Mary' for 'his parents,' was made in the presumed interests of a very vital doctrin—that of the immaculate conception." Critically, though not theologically, our revisers gracefully submit to the readings "his father" and "his parents." And so they retain the last of Mark, but tacitly allow its spuriousness, and candidly tell us in the margin at Luke xxiv, 51, that "some ancient authorities omit 'was carried up into heaven.'" Strike off the last of Mark, and omit that one clause in Luke, and the gospels contain no hint of the bodily ascension of Jesus. And thus, one by one, the "vital doctrins" go. Let us recommend the revised New Testament for use in all debates with the Christian clergy. JABOB STINSON.

Freethought vs. Rum.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The position of Freethinkers on the drink question is very peculiar. The temperance movement having to some extent courted the churches, though with very meager success, persons entirely without the churches hav come to look upon temperance as something religious. Quite a large class of Freethinkers hav, under this impression, withheld themselvs almost wholly from the temperance movements. Some Freethinkers, fearing to fall into some sort of fanaticism, hav purposely indulged in a moderate amount of alcoholic stimulants, believing such course to be the more liberal and to indicate greater personal freedom.

There is also a large class of Freethinkers of German blood who think it incumbent upon them to keep up old German fashions. They hav been taught that lager beer is a German drink, and that it would be distinctivly un-German to refuse to drink it. These people undoubtedly dream of the fatherland as they sit dozing over the foaming lager.

We hav still another class of Freethinkers, if we base our system of classification upon their attitude to the drink traffic. Some Freethinkers are radical temperance men. Year after year not a drop of alcohol in any form passes their lips, except, perhaps, as a dissolvent of medicins. They do not hold this belief as religious fanatics, because they hav no religious belief upon which to base a fanaticism. It is not a superstition.

This class believe it to be a scientific truth, that is, a fact capable of scientific demonstration, that alcohol is not a food, that it in no way adds strength, health, or vitality to the human system. Affirmativly, they believe that it is a fact well proved that alcohol is destructiv to animal organisms, that the stimulation is at the expensiv wear of delicate tissue; that the habit of tippling, when it does not lead to the disgraceful and demoralizing habits of the drunkard, lowers the standard of health, deranges the functional activity of the visceral organs, and leaves, or rather keeps, the moderate drinker in that condition of bodily health, or ill-health, in which he is the peculiar prey of disease.

In other words, the moderate drinker is not properly fortified against the initiatory attacks of disease. If this position is tenable he has reason enough to leave it alone, and to refuse to giv it to his friends.

In the Popular Science Monthly is a series of articles on "Physical Education," by Felix L. Oswold, M. D. In one of these he deals with the subject of dram drinking. These articles ought to be of peculiar interest to Freethinkers from this fact: in the Investigator during March an article appeared entitled (I think) "Expensiv Gods." It was an exceedingly good article. It attracted the attention of the editor to such an extent that he invited its author to contribute some more to his columns. The article was signed "Felix L. Oswald," and simply from similarity of name and style I hav made the guess that the contributor to the Science Monthly and to the Investigator are one and the same person.

However that may be, the position taken in the Popular Science Monthly on the subject of alcohol drinking is that of science. Religion and sentiment are wholly crowded out. If the medical men decide upon purely scientific grounds that alcohol is to the human body a foreign substance that can only work it injury; that from its habitual use only misery can follow, we who hav no god save truth and no knowledge save that given by science are very much to be blamed if we do not hear and heed their voices.

One who knows nothing of this subject save what he may hav learned at prayer-meetings is not altogether at fault if he pays little or no attention to the matter; unless, indeed, he has been led to think there is another side to the subject—that deeper down in the laws of nature are great necessities commanding total abstinence—laws that are enforced upon the slightest disobedience.

The Freethinker keeps close to nature in all her devious ways so far as they are known to him. He acknowledges her eternal sway, he obeys with meekness her laws, he swears eternal allegiance to her government, knowing that happiness is only to be found within her realm.

Let him but see that total abstinence from alcoholic stimulants as a beverage is nature's law and he obeys with cheerfulness and alacrity.

FREE THOUGHT.

Report of the Hartford, Mich., Convention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The convention of Spiritualists and Liberalists advertised for Hartford, May 28 and 29, 1881, was called to order by the President, L. S. Burdick, at three o'clock, P. M., on Saturday in Reynold's Hall, with a fair audience present. The afternoon was occupied with short speeches from the different speakers and members present, closing with an impromptu poem by Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn from the subjects selected by the audience, "My Spirit Home," and four others.

Saturday evening, Mrs. M. C. Gale gave a short address on evolution, after which she described several spirit forms in different parts of the hall. Mrs. Allyn then gave a psychometric glove reading, most of which was admitted to be correct, closing with a poem.

Sunday morning, convention met at 9.30, devoting an hour to conference. On motion the chair appointed the following committees, on finance, to act with Mrs. R. A. Sheffer, Treasurer, E. L. Warner, Mrs. Sarah De Moss of Decatur, and M. C. Wilson, Fennsville. Committee on Memorial, Mrs. Elvira Chidester, Bangor; J. DeMoss, Decatur, and Mrs. Lide Brown, Breedsville. Mrs. Woodruff then gave the morning address, taking for her subject, "The Perfections of God and the Faults of Man." She compared men to an oak, needing an eternity in which to ripen thought; people would like to jump into goodness rather than wait to grow into it. Her entire lecture was one profusion of choice gems. Finance Committee reported favorably, when Mrs. Allyn gave a poem to close.

Afternoon session met at two o'clock, when Committee on Memorial reported as follows: "Your Committee on Memorials would respectfully report that in the ever-revolving order of events sister Lydia Sheffer Tucker has been called to change the seen for the unseen, and is no more with us in the physical form, and in memory of the quiet and unassuming deportment of our sister, we hav only the best living example of self-sacrifice to others' good that has been exemplified in a life of interested usefulness for others, and to the friends and relativs of our sister we would extend our heartiest sympathies and condolence."

Mrs. Allyn gave the afternoon address, from a subject given by a member of the audience, "Is the Origin of Idolatry Truth or Ignorance?" She held that it was born in superstition and cradled in theology, and her utterances were bold and radical, with an occasional humorous anecdote by way of illustration, holding the audience in rapt admiration for over an hour. Another of her poems closed the session.

Sunday evening, convention met at 7.30, Mrs. Elvira Chidester, Vice-president, in the chair. The increasing audiences at each session culminated in a full house. Mrs. Gale spoke on progression; she urged the necessity of harmonious homes, that spirit children might be attracted, showed progression from ancient mediumship to the present, under the same guiding law.

Mr. Bigelow, of Kalamazoo, was present and added harmony to each session of the convention by his soul-inspiring music and songs. Mrs. Allyn gave three glove readings which were acknowledged correct in nearly every statement, followed by a poem, which closed the exercises of the Convention.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1881.

Six Days of Recreation.

On Monday, the 4th inst., the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and his better half left the heated, noisy streets of this city to visit the scenes of their former home, to enjoy the society of the friends of olden time, and to hav the smell and taste for a few days of pure country air. The Harlem road was the one selected, and the ride among the hills and through the valleys of Westchester, Putnam, Dutchess, and Columbia counties was lovely and most interesting. It was comforting to look upon the beauties of nature so lavishly spread out over a thousand hills and valleys, the whole surface of the earth teeming with nature's richest verdure and the husbandman's choicest crops. It being the national holiday, the country swains and maidens, in their best array, boarded the train at many of the stations at which it stopped, going from town to town, probably to trip the light fantastic toe in some Fourth of July ball or join in the festiv picnic in some beautiful grove or shady woods. Their movements were watched with interest and their hilarity was greeted with gladness.

A ride of six hours brought THE TRUTH SEEKER pair to the beautiful valley of New Lebanon, and here the fond scenes of childhood and youth burst upon the glad view. A walk of a mile and a half across the flat and up the gradual hill brought them to the quiet, lovely Shaker village where the editor once resided thirteen years, and the wife more than twenty years, and this nearly half a century ago.

It was extremely pleasant to mingle with the surviving friends of childhood and youth, to take them by the hand, and to feel the sincere friendship entertained by those who remain at the old home, while many others hav wandered over the wide earth, some with good success, others ill. The editor, with unalloyed pleasure, walked through the village, among the orchards, gardens, and fields where once he faithfully toiled, and climbed the mountain side and explored to some extent the beautiful shady woods where his boyish and youthful feet often trod. The charming view at this season of the year from that mountain side of the lovely valley below, the beautiful, cultivated hills in the northwest, the wooded hills in the west and south, the valley stretching away to the west, with the grand old Catskills in the distance, forty miles away, is one of the loveliest in the world. This, so often enjoyed in childhood and youth, was again highly appreciated on this lovely July day. A travel of thousands of miles will hardly present a more grand and lovely scene. The day spent in this charming place passed rapidly away.

Next, a ride to Rochester, through central New York, and over an extended and teeming stretch of country, is hard to excel. Few countries in the world are more lovely. The object of the trip to Rochester was to visit she grave of the editor's mother, who has been buried less than thirty months, and an only sister living at the "Sea Breeze," seven miles from the city, on the shore of Lake Ontario, at the mouth of Irondequoit Bay. The two days passed there were most agreeably occupied in visiting, walking in the neighboring grove, and in taking steamboat rides on the bay, five miles in length, surrounded by summer cottages, boarding-houses, hotels, places of summer resort, and lovely natural scenery. Fishing-grounds are abundant in this locality, and thousands of the finny tribes are caught in its prolific waters. Large numbers of the people of Rochester and vicinity visit this locality daily during the warm weather. On the Fourth from ten to fifteen thousand people were in attendance. The editor's sister is the proprietor of the "Sea Breeze," a large, imposing hotel, pleasantly located on the shore of Lake Ontario, as aforesaid.

On Thursday evening of the 7th inst. a reception was tendered the editor at the residence of Mrs. Amy Post, 36 Sophia street, Rochester. The attendance was large, but not nearly so large as it would hav been had not a pouring rain of two or three hours continuance just before the time of meeting, kept at home many a few miles out of town who would otherwise hav been present. As it was, the parlors were completely filled with genial, enthusiastic, and most friendly men and women. Some were present who came in thirty or sixty miles to attend the meeting, and one dear friend, Wm. McDonnell, of Lindsay, Ont., came nearly three hundred miles. It indicates indeed a warm quality of friendship when friends come so far to meet one.

After a season spent in social converse order was called, and Mrs. Olive K. Smith sang in excellent voice the following beautiful lines by Massey:

THE PEOPLE'S ADVENT.

'Tis coming up the steep of time,
And this old world is growing brighter!
We may not see its dawn sublime,
Yet high hopes make the heart throb lighter.
We may be sleeping in the ground
When it awakes the world in wonder;
But we hav felt it gathering 'round,
And heard its voice of living thunder!
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

'Tis coming now, the glorious time
Foretold by seers and sung in story,
For which, when thinking was a crime,
Souls leapt to heaven from scaffolds gory!
They passed, nor see the work they wrought,
Now the crowned hopes of centuries blossom!
But the live lightning of their thought
And daring deeds doth pulse earth's bosom.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Creeds, empires, systems, rot with age,
But the great people's ever youthful!
And it shall write the future page
To our humanity more truthful;
The gnarliest heart hath tender chords
To waken at the name of "Brother;"
And time comes when scorpion words
We shall not speak to sting each other.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Out of the light, ye priests, nor fling
Your dark, cold shadows on us longer!
Aside, thou world-wide curse called king,
The people's step is quicker, stronger!
There's a divinity within
That makes men great whene'er they will it;
God works with all who dare to win,
And the time cometh to reveal it.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Freedom! the tyrants kill thy braves,
Yet in our memories liv the sleepers,
And though doomed millions feed the graves
Dug by death's fierce red-handed reapers,
The world shall not forever bow
To things which mock God's own endeavor!
'Tis nearer than they wot of now,
When flowers shall wreath the sword forever!
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Fraternity! love's other name!
Dear heaven-connecting link of being!
Then shall we grasp thy golden dream.
As souls full-statured grow far-seeing!
Thou shalt unfold our better part,
And in our life-cup yield more honey!
Light up with joy the poor man's heart,
And love's own world with smiles more sunny.
'Tis coming! yes, 'tis coming!

Ay, it must come! the tyrant's throne
Is crumbling, with our hot tears rusted;
The sword earth's mighty hav leant on
Is cankered, with our best blood crusted!
Room! for the men of mind make way!
Ye robber rulers, pause no longer!
Ye cannot stay the opening day!
The world rolls on, the light grows stronger—
The people's advent's coming!

Then Mrs. Amelia H. Colby spoke in her impressiv manner for about half an hour, alluding to the journey soon to be undertaken by the editor, the importance of the enterprise, and the necessity of his paper being sustained in his absence. She trusted that the Liberal friends present and in all parts of the country would firmly resolve that THE TRUTH SEEKER should not suffer for want of support while its editor is on the opposit side of the globe. She hoped that all would remember that Mrs. Bennett would remain in the office doing her best to hav the business promptly attended to. Taking the editor and his wife by the hand, she commended both to the friends present, and through them to all the Liberals of the country.

The editor made a few remarks, expressing his pleasure in meeting the friends present. The memory of this meeting would accompany him on his long journey, and no matter how far he might be separated he would remember the friends who had so kindly given him a "good speed" before starting. He knew the memory of friends at home would cheer him and sustain him when far away from these shores. He felt assured that there were a host of Liberal friends all over the country who would personally interest themselvs that THE TRUTH SEEKER should not suffer from neglect while he was away.

Mrs. Smith sang another beautiful song about the sweet by and by.

Liberal friends present renewed their subscriptions to the paper and others contributed to the round-the-world fund. A hearty hand-shaking was indulged in, many good-byes were spoken, and the friends parted in the very best of spirits, hoping that all present would meet again.

A train on the Central road soon came along, and next morning the editor and wife found themselvs in Albany. A day was spent in visiting the friends who were so kind to the editor when he was in prison. The prison itself was visited, the cell where the editor was incarcerated, and also the hospital in which for weary months he was confined. He saw the bed on which he slept and many times ineffectually tried to sleep. He again sat by the same post where he wrote the two large volumes, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times;" but how different the sensation upon entering the prison now from what he felt at the time he entered those walls a convict! How different his sensations and surroundings when he sat down to dinner with Superintendent McEwen's family, in the dwelling part of the prison building, from the time when he munched his distasteful, homely meal by himself in the lonely prison cell. The difference in the situation will not be difficult of appreciation on the part of the reader.

Friend Dr. F. E. Aspinwall and wife, the latter of whom is an acquaintance of many years, spent a good share of the day with us. The whole was closed by a pleasant drive in the Superintendent's family carriage through Washington Park, which contains several hundred acres, beautifully laid out and highly cultivated. Albany may well be proud of her park; in beauty it is scarcely behind our own Central Park in this city.

The next day, Saturday, the same carriage, accompanied by Mrs. Van Allen, who was especially the editor's friend while in prison, visited the society of Shakers, seven miles out, in Watervliet, where resides a sister, a cousin, and an uncle of Mrs. Bennett. Here also resides Elder Lomas, who was very kind to the persecuted editor while in prison, visiting him frequently and ministering to his needs. The weather was pleasant, the greetings of numerous friends most cordial, and the day thus passed off altogether lovely.

Returning to Albany in time for the evening train to New York, the ride down the Hudson was a pleasant one, and at 11 P. M. the editor and wife found themselvs at home again, a trifle tired, but highly satisfied with the week's recreation.

A Farewell Reception.

The Fourth New York Liberal League will giv Mr. Bennett, its worthy president, a reception previous to his departure on his round-the-world trip, at the residence of Daniel E. Ryan, 231 West Thirty-seventh street, on Sunday evening, July 24th. Members of other Leagues, and all Liberals in New York and vicinity, are invited to unite with us in making the occasion one of pleasure, and to testify to the esteem in which our champion is held. We hope Mr. Ryan's spacious parlors will be crowded with friends. Let everybody who can conveniently come do so. E. M. MACDONALD, Secretary.

When We Leave for Europe.

Seeing an announcement in the London National Reformer that the International Federation of Freethinkers will be held on the 25th, 26th, and 27th of September instead of the 15th, and wishing to attend that Congress, we shall not be under the necessity of leaving home quite as early as intended at one time. We hav laid out considerable work to do before our departure, and will undoubtedly need every day between this and August 1st to complete the work we hav in hand. We now think it will not be far from August 1st when we take steamer for Europe on the long voyage round the world.

We are quite willing to still add new names to the list of subscribers who wish the volumes to be written descriptiv of the countries visited. The more generous the contributions the more extensiv will the journey be made, more divergences in the interior will be carried out, and the more interesting and valuable the volumes will be. As it is decided to illustrate them pretty fully, we hope there are a hundred or two more who wish a copy. Their names will with pleasure be added to the already generous list.

AN INFIDEL ABROAD. D. M. Bennett's letters from Europe. $1.50.

IF the President should recover, a vigorous claim will be set up all over this Christian land that prayer did it. Hundreds of salaried preachers will be willing to asseverate that they prayed to their God to spare the life of the President, and that they fully believe their prayers were efficacious. Perhaps that will settle it. But if God does not want the President to die, why did he suffer him to be shot? Why did he let such a worthless Christian villain make two shots with a bulldog pistol at our worthy chief magistrate? Would it not hav been better to prevent such a rash deed than to permit it and then hav to spend several weeks to correct and repair the damage? Is not prevention in this case, as well as in all others, better than cure?

IT is reported that Col. Ingersoll, by a fortunate investment in mining speculations, has become worth a large amount of money. It is to be hoped the report is well founded.

An Earnest Request.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Allow me to earnestly request every Liberal who reads these lines to make an effort to get the following notice published in his or her local paper. And I would be pleased to receive a copy of each paper containing the notice. H. L. GREEN.

Salamanca, N. Y., July 8, 1881.

FREETHINKERS' NATIONAL CONVENTION.

The New York State Freethinkers' Association has called its Fourth Annual Convention to be held at Hornellsville, N. Y., to commence August 31st and continue in session five days.

And the association, as heretofore, has invited the Freethinkers of the United States and Canada to meet with it in general convention on that occasion. And it is expected that Canada and most of the states of the Union will be represented at Hornellsville.

Arrangements hav been made with the hotels and boarding-houses of Hornellsville to entertain those who attend for $1 per day. The railroads will carry passengers at greatly reduced rates, and the prospects are that it will be a gathering of many thousands.

Dr. Shattuck, of Hornellsville, has just refitted up his large and commodious Opera House, and contributes the use of it free to the convention. Near the Opera House is a fine, pleasant, well-shaded park in which private parties can erect tents, and, if necessary, where outdoor meetings can be held. Some thirty of the ablest Liberal speakers in the United States hav been engaged, and those having the matter in charge predict a most successful convention.

Round-the-World Fund.

The following persons hav pledged five dollars each (one share) to help take THE TRUTH SEEKER editor round the world. Those preceded by an asterisk (*) hav already paid. Those not paid will oblige by remitting promptly. Two or three volumes of the book descriptiv of the journey will be mailed free to each contributor as soon as ready.

Our sincere thanks are extended to those friends who hav kindly sent in their five dollars to help us around the world. We trust none will regret the investment. If those not having a star attached to their name will allow us to add one, we will be obliged to them. The sooner the stars are attached to every name the sooner we will be ready to start on the long journey.

We do not wish to urge those upon whose pledges we decided to make the journey, but will remark that those who wish their contributions to reach us before we start will hav to remit with very little delay. We think all the sums will be needed. If others feel to join the starry galaxy they will be welcome. The names of the donors will be published in Vol. I. of the work descriptiv of the journey, which will be fully illustrated.

Our Proper Foe.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I cannot from my standpoint of knowledge estimate any writer or public speaker a humanitarian, philanthropist, or reformer who exultingly trifles with the belief in immortality, and in addition attempts to create a love for the blanching doctrin of the soul's annihilation.

Grant that the historic trails of all religions hav been found, with few exceptions, to hav been bloody, cruel, and tyrannical; surely that public teacher must be lacking in the powers of discrimination or feeling, or recklessly iconoclastic, who compares the natural impulse of man's nature, the ever-present, ever-activ element of hope of a continued existence in some form, with the countless vagaries of religion, however grotesque.

To the philanthropic thinker or the broad-minded reformer, a belief in immortality, with its multifarious spiritual proofs (which every one, if he chooses, can privately examin), is not the antagonist he ought to assail. It is the ignorant assumptions of mercenary, cunning, aristocratic priestcraft. It is to mark priestcraft's early germs of existence; its rise, growth, and development up to its present indolent, aristocratic proportions. It is this parasite of mental liberty that needs exposure and extermination until man is allowed to do his own thinking; until priestcraft under any form shall, like its twin fellow kingcraft, be known as an enemy to progress and humanity; until man is allowed to choose and ponder upon his own probable position in the great invisible, infinit republic. Surely here is work enough for the Liberal reformer, rational and comprehensiv, and in full accord with the developments of science.

Let the Liberal reformer select his proper antagonist, priestcraft. Monstrous as it is, it is but the outgrowth of man's natural aspiration for a continued existence. Let the reformer not waste his energies, but select his proper foe—this great obstacle to every advancement. Nor let him be discouraged at the slow progress of human emancipation, or expect too rapid a change. It is not to be expected that priestcraft, with its "venerable verdure of antiquity," will be subdued in our time, or many, many succeeding generations, sustained as it is by its mythology, its romance, its poetry, and its music. But the commonest observer can perceive the absurd struggle the priests are undergoing to make their Bible and catechisms conform to the imperativ developments of science. But yield they must. There is a flank movement operating in their midst and around them, thanks to the refining influence of woman, and that through the all-powerful autocracy of fashion. Our churches are gradually becoming halls for solemn pastime. In them the picturings of hell are more mildly drawn than in the past. Fascination in this age is far more effectiv and profitable than denunciation. The fragrant aromas of "West End," "Jockey Club," "White Rose," "Sweet Brier," etc., hav most triumphantly overpowered the stench of burning sulphur, and operatic music with cornet solos has completely drowned the shrieks of the fabled damned. Now this looks like progress. It is progress. For the Calvinism of to-day is not the cruel and bloody Calvinism of the past. Methodism of to-day is not the frantic fanaticism of John Wesley. Quakerism of to-day is not the drab-colored, self-denying, self-sacrificing Quakerism of George Fox or Barclay. Baptism with its tepid bath-tub and India-rubber tights and overalls bears little resemblance to "Jordan's stormy banks," and thus we slide along in the true course of scientific unfoldment. Whether man is naturally a religious being or no, let the true reformer by all reasonable means shield him, if possible, from those sanctimonious harpies who make a trade of terrorizing his mind with childish, monkish fables. Teach man that his highest position is to be the only priest in his own household; to rely upon his own reason as the highest tribunal known; but above all trifle not with his cherished hope of immortality. As the sorrowing mortal lays away the remains of one once cherished—perhaps of a father, mother, benefactor, or friend—his memory should not be embitterd and chilled with the icy pall of eternal oblivion.

I sometimes wonder at the self-satisfied remarks of some of your contributors—Liberals who seem to glory in a species of "Knownothingism," and discourse of the great "invisible" world as the great "unknowable!" That such sentiments should be expressed by any class of thinkers making any pretension to scientific research is very surprising. There was a period once when such remarks would hav passed unnoticed. Even our learned Dr. Benjamin Franklin and the savants of Paris made the same mistake, denouncing the immortal Mesmer, after giving his daily public experience their attention, as a fraud and impostor.

DAVID BRUCE.

Thought Scientifically Defined.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

I hav read with much care and interest the different articles in your paper on the thought question. The views entertained by the several writers seem to be too much involved in speculation to bring about a speedy solution of the question. Scientific methods hav not been very strictly adhered to in its treatment, but many valuable ideas hav notwithstanding been brought out, which cannot fail to be great helps to a better understanding of what thoughts are.

In your reply to Mr. Chapman, near its close, you hav given the foundation of the question, beyond doubt, in the following sentence. You say, "In a somewhat similar way, by the combustion of digestion and the assimilativ process, the human stomach, combined with the other parts of the organization, daily converts meat, bread, and potatoes into the finest thoughts, the most beautiful prose and poetry." What you here say is true, and rightly understood must lead to a final solution of the question.

It is a well-known fact that the chemistry of living organisms can only change the various substances received into them into new compounds, but no element will be found in these which did not belong to those which were taken into the organism. Another fact of the highest importance in this connection is that the compounds formed by assimilation are often identical in their elementary composition, but widely different in their properties. Albumen, fibrine, and casine belong to this class of compounds; that is, they are isomiric.

That it is the function of the brain and nerves to prepare, combine, and eliminate thoughts from the substances which are taken into the system, and which are necessary to keep it in a healthy state, is a fact of observation, just as it is the function of the liver to secrete bile from these substances and eliminate it. The same is true of all the other organs.

Thoughts, then, are composed of carbon, oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, potash, phosphorus, etc. That the atoms of these elements are smaller in thoughts than in flesh and bone is true; and that their mobility is increased in consequence is also true, because their magnetism or life is progressed as well as the atom which serves as its body; but it is matter still.

Discussion.

Reply to Mr. Bennett's Twentieth Letter.—Concluded.

Even of those considerations which rightly belong to the subject there is ever with the apparently most candid unbeliever an inability to present the case with exactness. Bias or wrong teaching, if not wilfully perverse interpretation, often lead astray when the will seems really desirous of finding truth. I consider myself that the scriptures themselves have in themselves absolute proof of their divine origin and convince every candid reader who is really seeking to know the truth. I consider that if the book is not self-evidential, it is not divine. But it is in criticising the internal aspects of the Bible that Infidelity appears most strangely incapable of being just. I will give an instance of this in a paragraph from one of the most courteous and apparently fair-minded of the writers against the scriptures, and it will bring into view an objection which you hav often sneeringly made and to which I hav not formally made any but the briefest reply. I refer to the doctrine which in scriptural language reads, "He that believeth on the son hath eternal life, but he that believeth not the son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

Mr. Greg, whose language you will allow me to accept as being more reverent than yours, expresses his criticism of the doctrine as follows: "That of two individuals whose degree of virtue is so similar that the question of precedence can neither be decided by the keenest human insight nor expressed by the finest minutiæ of human language, one would be rewarded with eternal joy, and the other be condemned to everlasting torment, is assuredly among the rudest of religious conceptions. Yet, to all appearances, such is the notion of future retribution held by the New Testament writers."

Now, if there was no further revelation of the meaning of these words than this verse and others like it, there might indeed be strict truth in the criticism. But Mr. Greg knows and you know that there are verses in scripture explanatory of the nature of faith and of the principle of the judgements of God that make this extract of Mr. Greg's an absolute perversion. Scripture is entitled to be heard in its own behalf and to be judged by its own teachings, not by the garbled views of others. Of course the question of your or my belief of their teachings does not enter into consideration here, but whether it teaches that of two persons of equal virtue one is doomed arbitrarily to eternal punishment, and the other received into everlasting bliss. In the first place unbelief is represented in scripture, not as an innocent error of the head, but is a moral condition of the heart. As Burns says,

> "The heart's aye, the part aye,
> Which makes us right or wrang."

The presence of hydrophobia in the human system is often detected by the victim's aversion to water. Thus water may become the test of his condition. So a man's attitude toward Christ reveals his condition—his moral disposition. It needs no argument to prove that there is something unnatural and immoral in a child not believing an affectionate parent. It is self-evident. How much more the moral monstrosity of an intelligent creature not believing its creator! And this is the representation of scripture, that unbelief, in any form, shows a bad disposition; that it is born of it. It may not be as intrinsically evil to eat a fruit as to kill a man, but if God has forbidden them, the stealing of the fruit reveals the same evil disposition that culminates in murder. A bad tree cannot bring forth good fruit, nor, on the same principle, a good tree bad fruit. All sins, theft, lying, stealing, lasciviousness, are the fruits of the bad tree, the tree which in itself is inherently bad. Christ defines the moral attitudes and consequences of faith and unbelief as follows:

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God sent not the son into the world to judge the world, but that the world should be saved through him. He that believeth on him is not judged, he that believeth not has been judged already, because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten son of God. And this is the judgment that the light is come into the world, and men loved the darkness rather than the light, for their works were evil. For every one that doeth ill hateth the light and cometh not into the light, lest his works should be reproved. But he that doeth the truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, that they have been wrought in God" (Jno. iii, 16-21).

Thus without faith in Christ, whatever social virtues a man may have, however amiable, kind, honest, etc. he may be, they are like a few green leaves on a decaying tree. That which is the root of virtue—virtue of virtue—that which gives life and health—he has not. With a few reflected beams from the source of truth it may be, he will not receive them only through a darkened window, and so shrivels up and perishes. At the same time the penalty awarded is inexorably just—"he that knew his master's will and did it not shall be beaten with the many stripes, the less guilty with the few." More in detail the principles of judgment upon the lost are given and have been quoted in a former letter, but they will bear repetition.

"The righteous judgment of God who will render to every man according to his works; to them that by patience in well-doing seek for honor and glory and incorruption, eternal life. But unto them that are factious and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, shall there be wrath and indignation, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that worketh evil, of the Jew first and also of the Greek; but glory and honor and peace to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first and also to the Greek, for there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law; and as many as have sinned under law shall be judged by law; for not the hearers of a law are just before God but the doers of a law shall be justified, for when Gentiles which have no law do by nature the things of the law, these having no law are a law unto themselves, in that they shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith, and their thoughts one with another accusing or else excusing them; in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men according to my gospel, by Jesus Christ." (1 Rom. ii, 5-16).

Thus we see how just the judgment of God is, discriminating between the degree of guiltiness, awarding to the greater the many stripes, to the less the few, and rewarding every man according to his works, providing a sure salvation for those who, realizing the evil even in their best works, put their trust in that work which God has accepted as infallibly perfect—the work of his own son. Mr. Greg then presents a parody of scripture when he asserts that it teaches an arbitrary judgment wherein the same degrees of virtue receive a different and unequal reward.

It is in the field of science that Infidelity claims to hav scored her most important victories. The application of exact principles of criticism, it is said, proves scripture hopelessly human. And this "destructive" school enrolls daily new scholars; even from many pulpits principles are taught which undermine the truths for the defense of which they were established. But even here Infidelity is conspicuously inexact. Take the following admissions from a popular writer who considers himself very far from the kingdom of men like Mr. Greg and Mr. Newman and the school of modern Positivism, yet whose principles are equally dangerous. Of the results of modern historical science applied to the study of Christianity he says:

"It sets other religions by the side of it and shows us that their course through the world has been strangely similar. They, too, have had their sacred books and their incarnate gods for prophets; they have had their priesthoods, their traditions, and their growing bodies of doctrine; there is nothing in Christianity that cannot find its counterpart, even to the most marked details, in the life of its founder. Two centuries, for instance, before the birth of Christ Buddha is said to have been born without a human father. Angels sang in heaven to announce his advent; an aged hermit blessed him in his mother's arms; a monarch was advised, though he refused, to destroy the child, who, it was predicted, should be a ruler. It was told how he was once lost and was found again in a temple, and how his young wisdom astonished the doctors. A woman in the crowd was rebuked by him for exclaiming, 'Blessed is the womb that bare thee.' His prophetic career began when he was about thirty years old, and one of the most solemn events of it is his temptation in solitude by the Evil One. Everywhere, indeed, in other religions we are discovering things that we once thought peculiar to the Christian. And thus the fatal inference is drawn down on all sides that they have all sprung from a common and an earthly root and that one has no more certainty than another."

Mr. Mallock has put the story of Buddha in prose, as Mr. Arnold has in verse, largely indebted to the scriptures with which he professes to contrast them. It is strange, to say the least, to find that the support of an exact science is a mere, "It is said." It is the strength, nevertheless, of the whole system of destructive criticism. The criticism upon the sacred books of the East is as yet in an immature stage, but enough is known of them to put to blush the remarks quoted. No scholar of any repute would be willing to risk his reputation on such statements. It is a well-settled decision that those books containing the doctrines of Christna and Buddha which most resemble the gospel histories are productions of a period later than the Christian era—some even dating within a thousand years of the present time. There is no denial that there are some coincidences, but the differences between Christianity and preceding creeds are incomparably more numerous and decided, while the doctrines that are most similar in modern Buddhism are from Christian sources—the preaching of the missionaries of Christ in the first and second centuries. Then, for that matter, two centuries before Buddha's birth the ten tribes of Israel were transported to the borders of India, and carrying with them their books of prophecies and doctrine, the prophecies of the virgin's son, yet the mighty God, the Prince of Peace upon whose shoulder the government should be laid, might very easily reappear as the foundation of the Hindoo stories. But in the present state of criticism upon these books, when nothing is settled, either the authenticity and genuineness of any of them, or the question of chronology and interpretation, it is the very reverse of scientific method and proof to build any dogmatic system upon the dubious result.

Infidelity, however, in this connection does not even merit the praise of consistency; the consciousness of weakness is self-confessed when the mask need no longer be worn. Deep and radical differences there are which in an unguarded moment Infidels acknowledge. Thus Professor Tyndall quotes with great approbation the remarks of another that Buddhism is a gospel of "pure human ethics, divorced not only from Brahma and the Brahmanic trinity, but even from the existence of God." Surely when Buddhism is placed alongside Christianity this exhibits a greater chasm in its difference than communion in its points of coincidence. Mr. Leslie Stephen also adds his testimony that "the briefest outline of the religious history of mankind shows that creeds which can count more adherents than Christianity, and have flourished through a longer period, have omitted all that makes the Christian doctrine of a future state valuable in the eyes of its supporters." Surely this, too, is too wide a distinction to be bridged over by any analogy of the migration of ideas; the alleged patchwork has at least one of its most prominent squares of new cloth and original design.

The Christian doctrine of sin is another teaching which, if I mistake not, is purely Christian. Scholars tell us that there is no word in Greek that expresses the Christian conception; with the Greek and the Roman alike their idea was one of purely physical evil, the result of misfortune or madness or the fault of God, and, besides, as Carlyle says, "the old world knew nothing of conversion, instead of an 'Ecce Homo' they had only some choice of Hercules."

In the opening chapter of his exceedingly interesting Life of Christ, Dr. Geikie eloquently enumerates a few of the most prominent of the beneficent effects of the teachings of Christ upon our earth. Among them is the idea of a brotherhood of man—humanity. Until Christ proclaimed his doctrines in the valleys and hills of Judea the idea was utterly unknown; Greeks, Romans, Jews, each nation considered itself the favorite of heaven, with all the rest of mankind ordained its vassals or enemies. Celsus deemed it one of the proofs of the visionary character of Christianity that it was a religion intended for all men, but he little imagined that this very teaching would be one of the grandest forces in softening the passions and selfishness of men and be a preëminent factor in distinguishing the highest civilization known among them. You may assert that Christendom has been a scene of selfishness, rapine, and the most excrutiating tortures, applied ever with the professed object of upholding Christianity. But the scripture is not responsible for the acts of its perverters. The bloody career of Constantine, the butcheries of the Duke of Alva, the devilish cruelty of the Inquisition, are not the practices of those who when smitten on one cheek turn the other; they are not loyal imitators of him who, when reviled, reviled not again; who, when ill-treated, did not avenge himself. They all result from a non-belief of that doctrine of Christ's, "My kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight." His servants do not fight. To be sure, he also said, "I came not to send peace, but a sword," but he meant that his truth would awake the latent hatred of an evil world wherever faithfully preached. The sword was not to be used by his servants, but would be in the hands of his enemies. And so those using it, even under the banner of Christsanity, have been traitors to his cause. Yet notwithstanding all the unfaithfulness of professing Christianity it has been the real cause of the belief in the brotherhood of man, the originator and supporter of all schemes of political benevolence, hospitals, reformatories, temperance organizations, etc., and the exalter of woman to her proper sphere and dignity. These do not characterize oriental civilization, nor did they belong to any civilization before Christianity. They must therefore be a product of it.

The mutual doctrines of Christianity and other religions, when critically tested, dwindle to very few, and they are such that, to an unbiassed mind, they must be an argument in its favor. When you have mentioned a future life, heaven and hell, the guilt and depravity of men, sacrifice for sin, the priesthood, and even vague and broken whispers of a coming incarnation, you have enumerated, probably, all the doctrines or ordinances in which there is any resemblance. But even these are distorted. A future life before Christ, even to the Jews, being only insinuated, not revealed, was more the dreams of the poets and the voice of the hopes and aspirations of men, while as to the sense of sin every heart feels its burden, and confession, sacrifice, and priesthood seem but practical outgrowths of this feeling. The human race, as all the proofs of science points, came originally from one spot, and the remembrance of the fall in the garden of Eden, the snake, the curse, etc., were carried from this spot to all the different regions of the world in which their traditions are wafted from pole to pole, from the eastern and western extremes of the equator, the tale of the golden age, the box of Pandora, the snake, the happy isles, the gardens of the Hesperides, the flood of Deukalion, in different versions and strange names, the Mexicans, the Indians, the Norsemen, the Greeks, all unite to give universal testimony to striking facts of which the scriptures present the key and alone preserve a rational and connected recitation.

I have observed, also, with some surprise the utter disregard of the circumstances that so often modify the bare statement of the facts and doctrines of scripture. One prominent instance of the latter I have quoted from Mr. Greg. There are scores of others. As to misrepresented facts, witness, for example, the instances of capital punishment commanded by Jehovah in the Old Testament. The inspired teaching is that the nations doomed to extinction had been suffered to live against the demands of stern justice until the very land was defiled. For their vileness, and that they might not defile others, they were at length commanded to be exterminated. This was under a dispensation, in which God was the king—a theocracy, where infringement of the divine law by those to whom it was given met with instant punishment. Now what is the attitude which Infidel criticism assumes toward this fact? Utterly disregarding the crying corruption of the doomed people, it represents them as the innocent and defenseless victims of an unjust and heartless massacre. The principles which have been used in defaming the divine command in these instances, if carried into practical effect in any government, would paralyze the arm of justice and let loose the worst elements of social disorder and anarchy. There is a like jugglery of criticism in the treatment of many other facts and commands given in the Old Testament, which are distinctly stated to be only applicable under peculiar circumstances. These limitations Infidels have invariably overlooked or ignored. And this distinction, remembered, makes sad havoc with the puerile arguments which are patched together to give a seeming consistency and strength to the attacks upon the moral perfection of Christ.

It is a very common taunt of unbelievers that the immense body of Christians receive the truths of scripture traditionally. The fathers believed the books to be inspired, and, nurtured under such influences, the children, without any sufficient evidence (so it is said), receive them likewise. This is, however, either ignorance or something worse, for every Christian has within him, in the evidence of his own conversion, such an impregnable and unmistakable proof of the truth of scripture that any others are needless. No converted man has ever lapsed and died in unbelief, although many pretenders may assert their conversion and subsequent Infidelity. The evidence is too real, the rest is too sweet, the peace too nourishing, the communion too palpable, to ever darken in unbelief. Instead, however, of believing such experience, Infidels would have men accept the truths of science, so they assert, receiving nothing on any one's ipse dixit, but testing everything for themselves. Let me retort the argument. How many Infidels, how many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, have tested the foundation truths of science, and especially of the current Infidelity, miscalled science, for themselves? How many have verified the arguments upon which Infidel geologists seek to overturn the truth of the Mosaic record? How many have searched and calculated for themselves the assertions of the astronomers? Not one in fifty thousand. The greatest professors even in the chairs of science have had, in some cases, to receive unverified the tables and observations of others. One little error may lead to a totally erroneous conclusion. Who has verified every statement they received on the strength of which they cast away the scriptures? Believe me, all this rhodomontade about untrammeled reason, scientific truths, etc., exhibits more credulity and blind submission to man than is exhibited even by papists. Tyndall, Huxley, Spencer, and others reign as absolute despots, and not one out of a thousand of their admiring disciples ever stops to question, far less verify, their conclusions, or can verify them. Yet callow striplings attempt (and I remember an instance in my own experience where a youth who could not write an intelligent invitation to a dinner, nor would know how to behave among a company of intelligent ladies and gentlemen—and of whom I doubt whether he could spell the word science) attempt to justify unbelief because the Bible is contradicted by the discoveries of modern science. And to bring the argument nearer to the point, you cast away the scriptures mainly because they are unscientific. Tell me, how much of this science of which you discourse so glibly have you verified? Do you know that the testimony of the rocks contradicts Moses? Have you made innumerable observations, classified them, verified them beyond peradventure, selected the most important, without bias, harmonized all the difficult facts, etc? or have you sat comfortably in your office and at intervals opened a book of Tyndall's or Huxley's, or glanced at one of Denton's lectures, swallowed a page or two, mastered some scientific name, dropped the facts that conflict with your ideas, and never glancing at the conclusions of those who differ from your masters, wrote some editorial on the credulity of Christians, ending with the exhortation to test everything for themselves, to take nothing on faith, and to receive the truths of science?

As an evidence how consistent unbelievers are in their sarcasm as to the Christian's credulity and faith, the following quotation should effectually close the scoffer's lips. Prof. Huxley, in a late inaugural address before the "British Association for the Advancement of Science," said: "The evidence, direct and indirect, in favor of biogenesis ('life from life, and from nothing but life') for all known forms of life must be admitted to be of great weight. But though I cannot express this conviction of mine too strongly, I must carefully guard myself against the supposition that no such thing as abiogensis (spontaneous generation) has ever taken place in the past or will take place in the future. . . . If it were given me to look beyond the abyss of geologically recorded time to the still more remote period when the earth was passing through physical and chemical conditions, which it can no more see again than a man can recall his infancy, I should expect to be a witness of the evolution of living protoplasm from not living matter. That is the expectation to which analogical reasoning leads me, but I beg you once more to recollect that I have no right to call my opinion anything but an ACT OF PHILOSOPHIC FAITH" (Spontaneous Generation. Lay Sermons, pp. 364, 366).

What epithet shall we apply to such a course? If it were not for the seriousness of the subject, would it not be an object of ridicule to hear the blatant bellowings of Infidelity at what it terms the credulity of Christians, and yet put forth one of its most trenchant defenders to confess that he resists all evidence to perform an act of philosophic faith? Yet this is the eminent scientist of whom in some circles it is almost a crime to doubt the infallibility! Science babbles of faith! If this declaration is not a proof that Prof. Huxley is so hopelessly wedded to his idols that he is absolutely untrustworthy, I know not what could constitute proof.

There can be no doubt that the ages are running their course of evil according to the terms of the prophecies of the scripture. There can be no dispute by a thoughtful observer and an intelligent student of the New Testament that the end of the present dispensation will be failure on the part of man, even as it was with the Jewish. With no vague or uncertain voice is the teaching of scripture on this point, and history confirms it that Infidelity and Atheism are gaining seeming victory. The conflict may be long or short, but the outlook for a believer in the conversion of the world by the preaching of the gospel must be exceedingly dark and cheerless. Not so to the intelligent reader of the Bible. "Let favor be shown to the wicked," the scriptures assert, "yet will he not learn righteousness;" "but when thy judgments are in the earth the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness." For myself I believe it is not far distant when the nations will throw off the fetters and become openly Infidel. This is the course marked out in the teachings of Christ himself and in the epistles. Well indeed might the Lord ask, "When the son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?"

In the parables in Matthew xiii the Lord foretells the corruption of Christianity and the increase of unbelief. Of the seed the sower sowed, but one part yielded fruit—the other three were destroyed by the birds of the air, the unfruitful rocks, or the choking thorns. The man that sowed good seed had his field planted with evil weeds by his enemy—the mustard seed becomes an unnatural tree with birds of the air (always in scripture types of evil) breeding in its tainted branches—the kingdom of heaven is like leaven (always a symbol of evil) which a woman hid in three measures of meal until the whole became evil—leavened. In the epistles the last days are full of evil, corruption, heresies. Paul, Peter, John, Jude, Revelation, all more or less fully predict a general though gradual falling away. Thus Peter writes: "But there arose false prophets also among the people as among you; also there shall be false teachers who shall privily bring destructive heresies denying even the master that bought them. And many shall follow their lascivious doings, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of." "In the last days mockers shall come with mockery walking after their own lusts and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for from the day that the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from beginning of the creation" (2 Peter ii, 1–2; iii, 3–4). But the Christian need not fear that he whose prescience foretold this cannot provide for it—the very strength of Infidelity is only ripening to be consumed by the coming of the Lord. His own will be taken to meet him before this, and the time of Israel's salvation shall be at hand, for which the Jews have been kept a distinct nation these many weary centuries. But it is in the midst of universal and Atheistical darkness that he comes, as it is written of Israel: "Arise, shine! for thy light is come and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee! For behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and GROSS DARKNESS the peoples, but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee" (Isa. lx, 1, 2).

But what will be the practical fruits of the gospel which Infidelity proclaims? Too sure, even now, it is bearing fruit which are to many of its advocates like Dead Sea apples, fair without, but ashes within. There are even Infidels who deplore the fruits of their teachings, and it needs but little observation to assure us that its harvest will be universal lawlessness and social chaos. Socialism, Communism, Nihilism—the three fatal sisters—on the one hand; Freelove in the most licentious and unrestrained sense on the other, will most assuredly join together to hurry men to barbarism. Have you ever pictured to yourself seriously what would be the scene if the theories and doctrines for whose defense you are giving your whole influence and life had universal sway? Have you ever considered what depth they would have to satisfy your heart if every one of them were triumphant? Of course there is now the fascination of playing the character of a reformer—the opposition of others adds zest and enjoyment to it, and so the heart and mind are occupied and too busy to stop and inquire if it is happiness. But it will be different in the final act of the drama—the "reforms" will have been made, the reformer will sink out of notice and use. Will the condition of things then give the heart rest, peace, and happiness? There are very few earthly treasures that retain their value in the absence of competition. Is it not so with all your hopes?

The first practical effect of universal Atheism would be the obliteration of what is commonly called morality—it could not help but do this. In this connection I firstly mean by morality the social virtues of chastity—that is, that fornication, adultery, and incest are wrong. This is manifestly so, since one of the strongest impulses of the current of unbelief is to overturn the religious and legal permanence of marriage, in fact to grant to human beings that unrestrained license which belongs to the lower animals. This cannot be denied, because the proof is too palpable. Apart from the bias against it which nurture in a Christian country imparts, under Christian influences, it would be impossible to prove, if Atheism be true, that fornication is any more evil than a kiss. For that which makes it wrong is that the creator intended the nuptial act only for two persons of opposite sex, who are joined by an indissoluble band. Now teachings of this kind are mere poetic rhapsody about as true as the fable of the theft of Hermes, if there is no creator. And when the shame of seduction ceases, as it will cease, and to many has ceased, to bring a blush, the practice of this will be undoubtedly a matter of open acknowledgment.

I grant that from expediency murder and theft may be as restrained as now. But even these cannot be proven wrong on Atheistical principles. In fact, virtue and vice, good and bad, all lose signification and to the Atheist are the mere residuum of superstition, the influence of former religious teachings which he cannot shake off. No, sir; when to prove a certain act or thought to be wrong you tell me that it must be judged only by its effects upon mankind, you make as a standard in that case, the arguments of Nihilism, the will of the majority makes right. But if all men agree to be thieves, then stealing is not immoral on Atheistical principles, as, for instance, in ancient Sparta, when the children were only allowed such nourishment as they could steal from the tables of their seniors. And so of murder, if all men should delight in becoming Thugs, it would grow to be a delight to give or take life and lose all immorality. There being no supreme and unchangeable standard of divine right, morality must be ever changing with the passions of the people; the can-can would be virtue, running-a-muck honor, according as the majority would decide.

I do not say that all this will ever occur in its worst deformity, although much of it is of nightly occurrence in the shadows of the low dens of all our great cities; but my point is that it is not inconsistent with Atheistical principles. And as to proof of it, I might instance France and the Commune, German Socialists, and Russian Nihilism, with all their unblushingly avowed profligacy, to say nothing of Mr. Ingersoll's "Great Infidels," some of whom were open adulterers. Certainly Jean Jacques Rousseau might be taken as a model Infidel, and his life as detailed in his own "Confessions," a book which possessed great fascination for me in my Infidel days, might not inaptly be the inspiration of Infidelity, climaxed, as it was afterward, by his supposed suicide.

The dark picture I have drawn is no fancy picture. It is said that Voltaire severely censured Baron D'Holbach's "Good Sense" because it spread Atheism among the servants. He correctly estimated the effects. And even from among those who are foremost in their efforts to overturn a belief in Theism comes a warning voice. "Never," it cries, "in the history of man has so terrific a calamity befallen the race as that which all who look may now behold advancing as a deluge black with destruction, resistless in might, uprooting our most cherished hopes, ingulfing our most precious creed, and burying our highest life in mindless desolation."

I must remind the reader, too, that the greatest scientists admit that science cannot unravel the mysteries of the universe. That theory which is so largely held and so fondly deemed to be absolutely demonstrated, the theory of evolution, is utterly unprovable. And the heedless stars and the careless earth are dumb in reply to any question asked them of the future; light from the one that only makes the darkness visible, and a thorn or a flower cast from the other—poor replies to the persistent inquiries of the heart. Nature veils God, not reveals, and the text-books of science are but elaborated confessions of ignorance. And I cannot close this more happily than by the following confessions from Professor Tyndall. Reader, ponder it well:

"If asked whether science has solved or is likely in our day to solve the problems of the universe, I must shake my head in doubt. Behind and above and around us the real mystery of the universe lies unsolved, and, as far as we are concerned, incapable of solution. The problem of the connection of body and soul is as insoluble in its modern form as it was in the pre-scientific ages. There ought to be a clear distinction made between science in the state of hypothesis and science in the state of fact. And inasmuch as it is still in its hypothetical stage, the ban of exclusion ought to fall upon the theory of evolution. After speaking of the theory of evolution applied to the primitive condition of matter as belonging to the dim twilight of conjecture, the certainty of experimental inquiry is here shut out. Those who hold the doctrine of evolution are by no means ignorant of the uncertainty of their data, and they only yield to it a provisional assent. In reply to your question they will frankly admit their inability to point to any satisfactory experimental proof that life can be developed save from demonstrable antecedent life, I share Virchow's opinion that the theory of evolution in its complete form involves the assumption that at some period or other of the earth's history there occurred what would be now called spontaneous generation. I agree with him that the proofs are still wanting. I hold with Virchow that the failures have been lamentable, that the doctrine is utterly discredited."

I have already made a quotation on this point from Prof. Huxley. They are both significant. Reader, can you afford to receive theories on the truth of which an eternity hangs, in the face of such absence of proof? If so you can ill afford to call any one credulous, far less the Christian.

But I must conclude. No one can realize more intensely than myself how inadequately I have presented the Christian defense in this controversy, yet I indulge the hope that I have met at least some of your objections and demonstrated their futility, and that some reader may have been led to give this subject a real investigation. I hope I have not in opposing your views either in this letter or in those preceding been discourteous, or failed to treat you with becoming consideration. If I have forgotten to be as amiable or patient as I should have been, I offer as an apology the little time, not more than a few hours per week, that I have had to devote to you, and consequently many sentences have been roughly written that would otherwise have been revised.

I esteem you fortunate that in a few weeks you will probably have an opportunity of personally inspecting the most interesting country in the world, the Holy Land. You go to it in a state of mind very similar to that with which the celebrated French Infidel Renan visited it, almost a quarter of a century ago. Very possibly it may have the same effect upon you that it did upon him. "All that history," he writes, "which at a distance seemed to float in the clouds of an unreal world took instantly a body, a solidity which astonished me. The striking accord between the texts and the places, the marvelons harmony of the evangelical picture with the country which served as its frame, were to me as a revelation. I had before my eyes a fifth gospel, mutilated but still legible, and ever afterward in the recitals of Matthew and Mark, instead of an abstract being that one would say had never existed, I saw a wonderful human figure live and move." This confession is the more remarkable from the fact that M. Renan still remains an Infidel. It would be a very great pleasure to me to know that with you it had not only removed all doubt as to the real existence and noble character of Christ, but that it had also led you to love and serve him.

In the heat of argument and the temptation to please an admiring audience, it may be that you have omitted to give my side that unbiased examination which it deserves. I hope that in the leisure of your journey you may be inclined to more calmly and thoroughly investigate the claims of the religion of Jesus Christ, and that you may make one more of the many who, having enlisted against him in haste, on further reflection gladly take refuge beneath his cross. Such is the sincere desire of

Very truly your obedient servant, G. M. MAIR.

Our Twenty-second Letter to Mr. Mair.

HAS CHRISTIANITY ELEVATED WOMAN?

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: I think I conclusively proved in my last that Christianity is not a religion of love; that it has not taught mankind to live as brothers, and at the same time that it has not introduced sympathy into the world. In this letter I shall examine your position that "Christianity has alone elevated woman." Believing that I have succeeded in showing that the major part of your claims in this discussion have been untenable and false, I think I shall find no difficulty in demonstrating that this one in regard to the elevation of woman by Christianity is likewise untrue.

The career of the human race began, of course, in a state of savagery, when physical force gave the right of control. Woman, not being the equal of man in muscular strength, was forced into a state of vassalage and slavery. In primitive or savage times a union between the sexes was a matter of either force, fraud, or purchase. Woman was merchandise, by the sale of which her father, brother, or captor profited. In whichever way she was transferred from one ownership to another she became the property of the man who took her for wife, and he became her lord and master.

Unfortunately this rule has existed for thousands of years and among various tribes and nations. This unjust rule existed in most of the Asiatic nations, to which the Semitic races formed no exception. The Arabs and Jews were as oppressive to woman as any others of the Asiatic tribes, and their belief in Eloah and Allah modified their customs in but a very slight degree. It is very easy to satisfy ourselves that under the Israelitish rule woman enjoyed but little of the justice and equality which later and better civilizations have given her. Under that branch of Asiaticism the woman emphatically became the property of the man who took her for wife. The father gave her or sold her as he pleased to the future husband, who could take as many additional wives as he chose. The greatest and wisest of the kings of that race is reputed to have taken to himself seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines. How much liberty and equality that thousand women could have possessed can easily be imagined.

It was accorded to Jewish husbands by the religion which you believe to be divine that they could divorce their wives for very slight causes, and they were permitted to write out the bills of divorce to suit their own lordly notions. It was permitted by Hebrew law for a father to sell his daughter to be a wife, a concubine, or a maid-servant. As a proof of this we have to look no farther than to Jacob, the individual from whom the entire race is said to have descended. He served seven years for each of his two wives, as per bargain made with the father, while his two concubines were much more easily obtained, the sons of whom became the heads of several of the twelve tribes of Israel.

When in war the Hebrew captured his enemies, he exercised the right to select such of his female captives for wives as he pleased, and there was nothing in their very divine religion to prevent it. "Holy writ" sanctions this divine business. In Deuteronomy xxi, 10–14, this beautiful command is given:

"When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the Lord thy God hath delivered them into thy hands, and thou hast taken them captive, and seest among the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her, and thou wouldst have her to be thy wife; and then thou shalt bring her home to thy house; and she shall shave her head and pare her nails, and she shall put the raiment of captivity from off her, and shall remain in thy house, and bewail her father and her mother a full month; and after that thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife. And it shall be if thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go whither she will; and thou shalt not sell her at all for money, and shalt not make merchandise of her, because thou hast humbled her."

An idea of the justice and equality accorded to woman in the time when the Israelites were under the immediate control of heaven, and of a commendable way to secure wives, may be obtained from another part of the divine word—Judges xxi, 20–22:

"Therefore they commanded the children of Benjamin, saying, Go and lie in wait in the vineyards; and see, and behold, if the daughters of Shiloh come out to dance in dances; then come ye out of the vineyards, and catch you every man his wife out of the daughters of Shiloh, and go to the land of Benjamin."

This conduct on the part of God's children was not unlike that of the pagan Romans when a scarcity of marriageable women existed among them; and Romulus is said to have invited the Sabine people from the neighboring towns to witness some interesting public games, when in the midst of the entertainment the ardent Romans rushed in, and each selected such fair damsel as best suited him or he could secure.

Inasmuch as Christianity is built on Judaism, it is almost to be wondered at that Judaism was not considered the lever which elevated woman instead of giving the honor to her child and successor. It is hard to see that Christianity made much advance with regard to the status of woman over its parent, Judaism. The older system fully sanctions polygamy; and though the younger did not perpetuate it, I recall none of the teachings of Jesus which forbid it. Nor do I recollect anything on the part of the same teacher particularly calculated to elevate woman above what had existed in surrounding nations before his time. He, perhaps, exhibited a natural fondness for such women as Mary and Martha, and the fond attentions of the former of them, who worked over his hair and anointed it, washed his feet and wiped them with her own hair; but if he took much pains to enlighten them in the truths of literature, science, or philosophy, in order to elevate them to a plane they had not before occupied, it does not appear from the fragmentary record. He had an interview with a fallen woman who had been taken in the act of adultery, which might be held as an indication that her morals were not as elevated as they might have been; but he had very little to say to her that was of an elevating character. If it was his purpose or pleasure to elevate woman and to give her a higher position than she had previously occupied in the world, he had a singular way of showing it, for none but those of active imaginations like yourself would ever suspect it from anything he said or did. Even as he said nothing to the disparagement of human slavery, so he also said nothing to the condemnation of the degraded condition in which woman had been held for thousands of years. If he was in favor of woman's rights, as understood in our day and time, he was indeed a very weak advocate of the reform; Lucy Stone or Susan B. Anthony would beat him out of sight and back again in a very short time.

The status in which Christianity placed woman may be correctly understood from the teachings of the great apostle Paul, who undoubtedly had far more to do in founding and establishing Christianity than Jesus himself. His woman's-rights maxims should not be forgotten in this day of woman's advancement:

"Wives submit yourselves unto your husbands" (Col. iii, 18). "For the husband is the head of the wife" (Eph. v, 23). "Let your women keep silence in the churches; for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And if they will learn anything let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a shame for a woman to speak in the church" (1 Cor. xiv, 34, 35). "Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord. Therefore, as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything."

This kind of doctrine promotes the equality of woman with a vengeance. But Peter talks in the same elevating manner:

"Ye wives be in subjection to your own husbands. Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord; whose daughters ye are" (1 Peter iii, 1, 6).

In contradistinction to such "elevating" doctrines taught by the founders of Christianity, the doctrines which you claim have given a greater degree of equality and independence to woman than she has derived from any other source, it may perhaps be well to take a brief view as to how woman was treated in former times by the pagan nations who knew nothing of Christianity. Woman received from the civilizations of many of the pagan nations, and before Christianity existed, a greater degree of personal and political liberty than Christianity has ever accorded to her. As long ago as Egypt was in her glory woman bought and sold in the markets; they were physicians; colleges for their instruction were established twelve hundred years before the Christian era. The "sacred songs" of Isis, participated in by women, were deemed by Plato to be ten thousand years old when he lived. The women of Egypt held the sacred office of priestess, and bore the sacred sistrum in the ceremonies of worship long anterior to the teachings of Jesus, Peter, and Paul. Women sat upon the thrones of Egypt side by side with her kings, and in a position of equality. I have seen considerable numbers of ancient Egyptian statues in the museums of Europe representing the king and queen of the country sitting together in equal power and right. It was the same among the common people, as Wilkinson shows us; men and women were equal in the marriage relation, or, if any difference, the greater honor was given to woman. The husband at the marriage ceremony promised obedience to the wife in all things; the husband and wife ruled the domestic domain in common; they sat upon the same double chair in life, and were laid in the same tomb in death. Crimes against women were of rare occurrence, and were punished with severity when committed. The religion of Egypt did far more for woman than the religion of Judaism and Christianity has done for four thousand years.

In Persia woman was co-founder of the Parsee religion, which taught the existence of one supreme

God, and had as pure a form of worship as the world has known.

The Druids of ancient Britain placed a far higher valuation on the councils of women in civil jurisprudence than did the founders of Christianity.

In Greece, as in nearly all the pagan nations, the female element was fully recognized in divinity, nearly all the mythologies having as many goddesses as gods, and possessing nearly equal influence and power in the celestial regions, while in Judaism and Christianity no such generosity and magnanimity is shown. The god or gods of these two religions are exclusively of the male gender, while the female element is utterly tabooed in the heavenly dignitaries as well as in the sacred offices. In Christian mythology we are saddled with the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—all of the male gender of course—while the female is not recognized in anything divine. According to Judaic and Christian belief there was originally no female in the celestial regions. When Yahweh wished to beget a son to send into the world to die, and thus atone for the blunder he had made in getting up the human race in such an imperfect manner, there seems to have been no female in heaven to act the part of mother, and Yahweh was compelled to come down to earth and hunt up a young, unsophisticated little Jewish girl whom he overshadowed and who was afterwards called "the mother of God." This is the nearest the Christian system comes to according an equality to the female sex, doing little better here in the earthly domain, while all the pagan nations deify the female equally with the male. Here is discerned the superiority of paganism over Christianity. If God exists at all he must be female as much as male. Nature is equally male and female, and it would seem that divinity should follow suit if there is any divinity to follow.

The injustice to women and the equality which is denied her are conspicuous, even down to the present day. Not only are women still forbidden on the authority of Paul to speak in church, but in the highest Catholic and Episcopal churches they are not even allowed to sing, though so capable of singing. In the rich cathedrals of Europe, including the Protestant cathedral of St. Paul in London, women are allowed to take no part in sacred music, the choirs contain no female singers, men and boys are trained to sing female parts, while females are rigidly excluded. I came to the conclusion that women were allowed to do little more than to confess their sins to the priests, to drop pennies into the sacred plate or box when it was brought around, and to do all in their power to sustain the system and its clergy. Whether the rule is followed because women are considered less pure and less religious than men I will not undertake to decide, but that the pagans treated their females with far greater equality is very certain. The ancient Grecians and Romans had their priestesses, their vestal virgins to guard the sacred fire, to administer to the rites of the goddess Ceres or Vesta, and they also officiated in the sacrifice to the Bona Dea, with the mystic ceremonies which no man's presence was suffered to profane. In the Eleusinian mysteries, dedicated to Ceres herself, woman had a most important part to perform, and it is said that few men had the courage to dare initiation into their most secret rites. All heathendom recognized a female priesthood, some making their national safety to depend upon them. Sibyls wrote the books of fate, and oracles where women presided were visited and consulted by all nations.

In the ancient civilization of Greece women were divided into three principal classes: first, the wives; second, the companions; third, the menials, or slaves. The second class was the most honored and enjoyed the greatest privileges. They were the best educated, they moved in the most cultured society, and were even considered the most desirable as companions and helpers to statesmen, orators, generals, historians, poets, and sculptors. The beautiful, learned, and accomplished Aspasia, the companion of the statesman Pericles, is a striking specimen of this class, and few women have lived who have been more highly or more justly honored.

Not only as important officials in the religious service of ancient Rome did woman acquire distinction, officiating as priestesses of the highest functions, but she received remarkable personal and property rights, as may be learned by a perusal of Sir Henry J. S. Maine, L. L. D., K. C. S. I., F. R. S., author of "An Essay on Roman Law" (1856), "Ancient Law," (1861), "Village Communities," (1871), "Early History of Institutions," (1875), than whom a more profound judge of ancient law and the rule of ancient nations has scarcely lived. He graduated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, and received a fellowship; was regius professor of civil law at Cambridge 1847-54; reader on jurisprudence at the Middle Temple 1854-62; was engaged in India on the great legislative reform, 1862-69; became corpus professor of jurisprudence at Oxford in 1870; and entered the council for the Secretary of State for India in 1871. He speaks in this way of the position of woman under Roman law before the introduction of Christianity:

"The jurisconsulists had evidently at this time assumed the equality of the sexes as a principle of the code of equity. The situation of the Roman women, whether married or single, became one of great personal and property independence. . . . but Christianity tended somewhat, from the very first, to narrow this remarkable liberty. The prevailing state of religious sentiment may explain why modern jurisprudence has adopted these rules concerning the position of woman which belong peculiarly to an imperfect civilization. . . . No society which preserves any tincture of Christian institutions is likely to restore to married women the personal liberty conferred on them by middle Roman law. Canon law has deeply injured civilization."

"Canon law," according to Christian authority, "is the whole body of church decrees enacted by councils, bulls, decretals, etc., and is recognized by a system of laws primarily established by the Christian church, and enforced by ecclesiastical authority. It took cognizance first merely of what were considered spiritual duties, but ultimately extended itself to temporal rights. It was collected and embodied in the ninth century, since which period numerous additions have been made." "The council of Laodicea in 365 in its eleventh canon forbade the ordination of women to the ministry, and by its forty-fourth canon prohibited them from entering into the altar. The council of Orleans in 511, consisting of twenty-six bishops and priests, promulgated a canon declaring that on account of their frailty women must be excluded from the deaconship." Nearly five hundred years later the council of Paris in 824 bitterly complained that women served at the altar, and even gave the people the "body and blood of Christ." The council of Aix-la-Chapelle in 816 forbade abbesses from taking upon themselves any priestly function. In view of all this, it is not at all strange that the learned Sir Henry Maine should declare that "canon law has deeply injured civilization." It is the same as saying Christianity has deeply injured civilization. And still you presume to set yourself up in opposition to such distinguished authority and to make the unsupported assertion that Christianity has improved civilization and elevated woman. This is as false as the frequent assertion that Christianity has fostered education and has been the friend and promoter of science. If I have space and time I wish to pay some attention to this branch of the subject.

Judge Waite informs us in his "History of the Christian Religion," page 23, that women in the early age of the church claimed the right to baptize their own sex, but the bishops, presbyters, etc., not caring to be released from so pleasant a duty, refused to yield to the reasonable request. On pages 384 and 385 he informs us that the constitution of the church of Alexandria, which is thought to have been established about the year 200, required the applicant for baptism to be divested of clothing, and after the ordinance had been administered, to be anointed with oil. Bunsen's "Christianity of Mankind," vol. vii, pp. 393-396; vol iii, Ana Lieta gives much the same account, and tells us that converts were first exorcised of the evil spirits which were supposed to inhabit them, and after undressing and being baptized they were anointed with oil. Quite likely we have right here the very reason why the bishops, priests, and presbyters refused to allow women to baptize each other, and why they preferred to perform the rite themselves. I am morally sure there are numerous titled bishops and pious presbyters of our own times who would be quite willing to baptize the younger female applicants in this manner.

In pre-Christian Germany woman enjoyed far greater rights, liberties, and equalities than she has since known under Christian rule. She was allowed to occupy distinguished positions in church and state. Purity and chastity were honored as highly as subsequently in any Christian nation. As in the Roman empire, woman was allowed to hold property in her own right; she was honored for her good qualities and given much greater consideration than later under Christian power.

"The women of Scandinavia were regarded with respect, and marriage was held sacred by both men and women. These old Berserkers reverenced their Alruna, or Holy Women, on earth, and worshiped goddesses in heaven."

It has been well and truthfully said that "Roman monogamy and German rigor and severity in regard to chastity and purity went largely to give us the dominant type of marriage we have to-day." This is far more rational than to claim that it came from the revealed will of heaven, as portrayed in the polygamy and concubinage of the Bible, not condemned or disapproved by Jesus or his apostles.

In fact, it is the teachings of the Bible that has been made the pretext of the church for the gross wrongs upon woman that through all these Christian centuries have been imposed upon her; and instead of Christianity being the fulcrum which has elevated woman in the scale of existence, it is the heavy weight of tyranny and oppression that has crushed her into the earth.

A rare old black-letter volume, published in London in 1632, entitled "The Lawes and Resolutions of Women's Rights," says, "The reason why women have no control in Parliament, why they make no laws, consent to none, is their original sin." This horrible idea, because, according to the old Bible fable, woman was the first to pluck and eat the apple, she has consequently been the leading cause of all the mischief in the world, and must therefore be debarred from occupying positions of honor and trust is more monstrous than anything found in all pagandom. As Mrs. Gage says: "This doctrine of original sin lies at the base of the religious and political disqualifications of woman. Christianity, through this doctrine, has been interpreted as sustaining man's rights alone. The offices held by her during the apostolic age she has gradually been deprived of through ecclesiastical enactments. To Augustine, whose early life was spent in company with the most degraded of womankind, is Christianity indebted for the full development of the doctrine of original sin, which, although to be found in the religious systems of several ancient nations, was not a primitive one of the Christian church. [The greater part of the Fathers of the Greek church before Augustine emphatically denied any real original sin.] Taught as one of the most sacred mysteries of religion, which to doubt or to question was to hazard eternal damnation, it at once exerted a most powerful and repressing influence upon woman, fastening upon her a bondage which the civilization of the nineteenth century has not been able to cast off. To this doctrine of woman's created inferiority we can trace those irregularities which for many centuries filled the church with shame for practices more obscene than the orgies of Babylon or Corinth, and which dragged Christianity to a darkness blacker than the night of heathendom in pagan countries—a darkness upon which the most searching efforts of historians cast scarcely one ray of light; a darkness so profound that from the seventh to the eleventh century no individual thought can be traced. All was sunk in superstition. Men were bound by church dogmas, and looked only for aggrandizement through her. The priesthood, which only possessed a knowledge of letters, prostituted their learning to the basest uses. The nobility spent their lives in warring upon each other. The peasantry were the sport and victim by turns of priest and noble, while woman was the prey of all; her person and her rights possessing no consideration, only as they could be made to advance the interest or serve the pleasure of a noble husband, father, or priest—some man-god, to whose lightest desire all her wishes were made to bend. The most pronounced doctrine of the church during this period was that through woman sin had been introduced into the world; that woman's whole tendency was toward evil; and that had it not been for the unfortunate oversight of her creation, men would be dwelling in the paradisaical innocence and happiness of Eden, blessed with immortality. The church looked upon woman as under a curse, considered man as God's divinely-appointed agent for its enforcement, and that the restrictions she suffered under Christianity were but part of a just punishment for having caused the fall of man. Christian theology thus at once struck a blow at these old beliefs in woman's equality, broadly inculcating the doctrine that woman was created for man, was subordinate to him, and under obedience to him. It bade woman stand aside from sacerdotal offices, forbidding her to speak in the church; commanding her to ask her husband at home for all she wished to know, at once repressing all tendency toward her freedom among those who adopted the new religion, and by various decretals taught her defilement through the physical peculiarities of her being. It placed the legality of marriage under priestly control, secured to husbands a right of divorce for causes not freeing the wife, and so far set its ban upon the nation as to hold single women above the wife and mother in holiness. After having forbidden woman the priestly office, it forbade her certain benefits to be derived therefrom, thus unjustly punishing her for an ineligibility of its own creation. Offices in the church, learning, property rights, freedom of thought and action, all were held as improper for a being secondary to man, who came into the world, not as a part of the great original plan, but as an afterthought of the creator" (Woman, Church, and State, in History of Woman Suffrage).

The laws passed by the Christian nations of Europe, as well as in our own country, have depressed woman to a state of comparative nonentity, so far as her legal status is concerned. "By marriage," says Mrs. Besant, "a woman loses her legal existence. The law scarcely recognizes her, save in unimportan cases, when it becomes conscious of her existence in order to punish her for some crime or misdemeanor. Blackstone said, and no subsequent legislation has modified his dictum: 'By marriage the husband and wife are one person in law; that is, the very being, legal existence of woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated or consolidated into that of the husband, under whose wing, protection, and cover she performs everything; and is therefore called in our law-French a feme covert (p. 442). 'Husband and wife are one person in law,' (Comyn's Digest, fifth ed., vol. ii, p. 208), and from this it follows that 'by no conveyance at the common law could the husband give an estate to his wife,' even for her own advantage, and that any premeditated contract made with her as to money she shall

Our London Letter.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The action taken by the pious bigots both in and out of Parliament with regard to the Bradlaugh case has clearly shown that they possess neither the wisdom of serpents or the harmlessness of doves. Had they possessed the former they would hav kept quiet, as by their continued persecution and illegal measures in continuing to keep the elect of Northampton from taking his seat in the House of Commons they hav elicited much sympathy, not only from his own natural supporters, but even from those who are imbued with strong religious tendencies. Many of the Nonconformists and some of the state church party hav had their indignation aroused by the ill-judged zeal of the self-chosen defenders of the faith, and are doing their best to aid the victim in asserting and gaining his political rights, though they are careful to make it understood that they do not approve of his irreligious views.

The stand taken by the bigots has, however, been of advantage to the Freethought party, as it has brought them prominently into public notice, and will doubtless tend to lead many who hav hitherto neither thought of or troubled about the subject to turn their attention to it and incline them to look into and study it, and find out for themselvs what it really is. Persecution has almost invariably done good to the cause attacked, though unfortunately the individuals who hav been selected to bear the brunt hav been deep sufferers, and the present instance will be no exception to the rule.

People are not so easily hoodwinked nowadays by coarse denunciation as they were but a few years back, and hav less blind faith in their spiritual guides, preferring to "try the spirits and see whether they be good or evil." They begin to see that Atheists are not the immoral, debauched, and wicked folks that lying, interested parsons hav invariably represented them. The spirit of inquiry now prevalent is a source of sore distress to the "fathers of the church" and those who gain a fat living by practicing on the credulity of their admirers. They are in great consternation to find that they hav for some time past been indulging in a false sense of security, having carefully closed their eyes to the fact that their followers hav been gradually falling off in numbers, but the awakening has come at last, and there is "weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth." It has just dawned upon the somewhat obtuse intellect of the Archbishop of Canterbury that Infidelity is "stalking throughout the length and breadth of the land," and is naturally horrified at the thought that if it goes on stalking much longer at a proportionate ratio it will be a sorry look-out for his income of £15,000 a year, derived from the hard earnings of the workers. Not, of course, that a humble follower of the carpenter of Nazareth, and successor of the fisherman of Lake Gennesareth, would lament at being deprived of the filthy lucre forced into his unwilling hand by a grateful country as some slight remuneration for his ghostly services and supervision of the churches. No, he would doubtless be only too glad to hav the temptation of worldly wealth removed from his path to glory, looking upon it as a thorn in the flesh, and submitting to it as decreed by God as a trial of faith. It must be so, as when this meek and pious individual a short time ago called a convocation of clergy and laymen to take measures for "stemming the tide of Infidelity" he stated that the only way to do this successfully was to print and send out to all parts of this unhappy and benighted land innumerable pamphlets, etc., containing overwhelming proofs of the "sublime truths of the Christian faith," and instead of meanly availing himself of an opportunity thus afforded of divesting himself of his burden of riches, he nobly abstained from such a course, preferring to still bear his cross, and show the world of how much self-abnegation he was capable. He therefore proposed that the faithful should supply all the funds necessary to enable the church to carry on the war against Diabolus. Let it be said with admiration that he does not stand alone, but that there are many amongst what are called the "superior clergy" who are quite as ready to show their self-denial and thoughtfulness for the welfare of others.

The warfare has already commenced, and a tract of thirty-two pages has just been published by a man who runs a mission hall in London. This interesting work is entitled, "Death's Test; or, Christians' and Infidels' Echoes from Seventy Death-beds." I find from it that Paine, Voltaire, Volney, Hobbes, Diderot, etc., all died miserably, calling upon Christ to help them, but without avail, which at once explodes the theory held and preached by so many, that "he will save all who call upon his name, even at the eleventh hour." I fancy it would hav been better for the writer had he left all that out, as he has proved too much. Most of the Christians seem to get somewhat hysterical and disjointed in their utterances at the last, and do as much calling as the Infidels, so I don't quite see what pull they get.

The writer of this somewhat monotonous little romance is a remarkable man. He is so often absent from the body and so wrapped up in things spiritual that he forgets to pay his debts, and a gentle reminder in the shape of a county-court summons has to be served on him occasionally, but owing to the reasons above given he is seldom to be found, except on Sundays, when the document cannot be served upon him, and then he appears boldly as a shining light and defies the devil and everybody else. When he does happen to be caught he invariably pleads poverty and swears he is not in a position to pay. No wonder he feels righteously indignant against wicked Freethinkers, who endeavor to act uprightly, and giv no cause of offense.

I am also the happy possessor of another edifying little work, entitled, "Prophecies Relativ to the Messiah, with Their Fulfilment," which has to be read in small instalments, as it requires much study to make head or tail out of it, and an attempt to read it straight through at one sitting would be too much for any ordinary individual—hopeless insanity would be the result. Here is a specimen prophecy: "The scepter shall not depart from Judah nor a law-giver from beneath his feet until Shiloh come." This is the fulfilment: "Pilate saith unto them, Shall I crucify your king? The chief priests answered, We hav no king but Cæsar." You won't want any more specimens, I should think. I hav given it quite up as a hopeless case. I can't see it anyhow; it is worse than the most difficult conundrum ever invented. Can any of your readers put me on the track to find out where the point comes in? J. D.

A Freethought Cargo.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Now, in coming for the first time before American readers, I don't want to serve them up anything stale or done up already by others and of which they are or may be surfeited.

No, my Freethought cargo is something new, and the only drawback about it is that the idea is not exclusivly mine; in fact, that somebody else suggested the matter to me, and that I am only in this case a kind of Vulcan carrying out the plans of an intellectual Jove.

"But enough enigma," you will say; "let us come to facts." Quite right. Here they are: A few weeks ago a Hungarian gentleman, Dr. Barkany, paid me a visit, and in the course of some conversation I had with him, he developed a plan of his relating to the establishment of a Freethinking colony, a Freethinking store of books for intending emigrants, etc.

The present article is the result of his suggestions. Shall I recall to my readers of New York the fact that a great number of emigrants coming to their shores embark at Antwerp? If they were unacquainted with the fact in question the officials of the Red Star line could tell them, so I need not fix any number. Sufficient be it for me to say that they form, perhaps, a majority of those that pass through the world-city.

This being granted, I would ask a question: How many of these new sons of America get to their chosen fatherland without falling into the clutches of one or the other of the numberless sects that claim to be a substitute for a God on the free soil of the United States?

Well, I guess one per cent, and all statisticians will tell you that I am too sanguin, too optimistic. But for the sake of argument, let us agree that such is the case—one per cent. Out of a hundred, ninety-nine are lost to the great Liberal party. And why? Because no one cares to take the trouble to gain them to Freethought; because while you are spending an enormous amount of time, money, and trouble to free them after they have had time to corrode their intellect in unmeaning dogmas and beliefs, you hav till now been unwilling to do anything for them when there was every chance to gain them easily to your cause.

Picture to yourself the poor German emigrant leaving his country and coming to Antwerp to embark on the steamer Netherland for America. Here he is, perhaps for several weeks, waiting for the departure of the vessel.

He had a country, a home, a religion; they all hav failed him. He has lost all confidence in the cherished chimeras of his youth and his early manhood. Sufferings, misery, harsh tyranny, hav weeded out of him all respect for established forms of government and creed. He comes before you, I may say, as soil carefully tilled and ready to receive and fructify any seed that you may care to implant in it.

What I assert is self-evident, for he accepts in America creeds as far remote from those of his childhood and first manhood as the two celestial poles, and that because he wants something to cling to, and cling he does, no matter how vile the fabric.

Why not giv him Freethought? The question lies in a nutshell, "to be the first in the field." And since I bring you the means to do so, there will no longer be any excuse for you should you allow those numberless intellects to go on wasting away, day after day, month after month, year after year, in the deadly grasp of superstition. Now, while the emigrant is waiting here in Antwerp to start for America, let us giv him the means of becoming acquainted with Freethought, Secularism, Liberalism, and all the conquests of modern thought; let us teach him to rely upon himself and liv for man and not for some improbable deity, who cannot in any case be gratified by his ridiculous sacrifice of self.

To make a long story short, let us make a champion of Freethought and a worthy citizen of a free country, so that immigration shall continually strengthen the great wave of Freethinking intellect now surging from east to west and from north to south through the great republic that livs and thrives under the glorious Stars and Stripes.

And to bring all this about I would, with Dr. Barkany, suggest the founding in Antwerp, near the Scheld, of a Freethought bookstore, where Freethought works in English, German, French, Flemish, and other languages could be sold at merely nominal prices.

Personally I hav a mind that if a lecturing hall, club-room, and dependencies, where the emigrants would be invited and could gain free admittance, could be attached it would help our cause in a wonderful degree. There would be no difficulty in getting German lecturers, Antwerp being full of Germans.

Of course the emigrants would talk among themselvs of what they had heard and seen, and would while the time away on board during the voyage by reading the works they had bought or, under certain circumstances, got free of charge, and it would go hard with us Freethinkers or we would regularly gain some some fifty per cent of their number before they reach your shores.

"Well," you say, "try the experiment." Well, my American brethren, that's where the shoe pinches. You see the Freethinkers of Antwerp and I are quite willing to do so, but we are practical men, and you cannot blame us for it. Or, who will benefit most by our labors? The American Freethought party of course. Agreed; then let them assist us manfully, and if any of them feel inclined to help in this noble work, let them organize committees on that side of the Atlantic and communicate with me here in Antwerp at 44 Rue des Capucines, and I feel confident that before the next emigration season the plan crudely sketched in this paper will hav been put into successful execution. In the mean time let us learn to be friends. Roger de Goey.

Temperance.

"Dare to say No! When asked to drink
Pause a moment, my boy, and think;
Think of the wrecks on life's ocean lost,
Who answered Yes, without counting the cost."

"The woe which the human race owes to alcohol alone is so far beyond description that I will here only record my belief that its total interdiction will form the first commandment in the decalog of the future.—F. L. Oswald, M. D.

It is for us Liberals and reformers to hasten the glad day when alcohol will no longer form one of the drinks of the world.

The church with all her powerful machinery has never in all the ages of the past succeeded in making us a temperance people. She has had her grand array of divines, elders, and deacons preaching for centuries from her god-book of the blessings of "a little wine," and even shows us the veritable "only-begotten son" of her biggest and best god, as converting the pure, clear, crystal water into this intoxicating beverage, and that, too, at a time when the guests who clamored for it were already "well drunken."

She spends thousands of dollars every year in making and buying wine to pour from silver pitchers into silver goblets to be handed around among the saints of her charmed ring at their public gatherings, the priest by a hocus-pocus having first pretended to change this "demon of the still" into eighteen-hundred-year-old blood! But were it really the carmin fluid itself not one of the elect would be persuaded to sip its ruby drops.

"Touch not, taste not, handle not" must be the motto of every true Liberal. Alcohol is not food; it is not drink. It satisfies no real want of the human system, and wherefore then should we use it? It calls forth, for the time being, a fictitious strength of mind and body, but every atom of either is drawn from the resources of the future. What one of us is there who would crowd all of life's joys into now and to-day? Or all our strength of mind and brain into one brief hour of work and leave the future vapid and soulless? Or hav the strength of a giant to-day and then pass years of the future in feeble, tottering helplessness? Yet all stimulants really act in this way and are consequently evil, bad, and wholly harmful. Many tell me I am too radical—I go too far—am bigoted and fanatical upon this great question of temperance in its many and varied lines—that I carry anti-rum, anti-tobacco, and anti-sexualism to extremes. But we are compelled to seek firm foundations, and where shall we find them unless we go back to nature and dig down to her bed-rocks? If we can prove that alcohol and tobacco hav no place in the animal economy, that they are positivly injurious as food or drink, or even as strength-producing or pleasure-giving agents, shall we not be justified in going to the uttermost extremes for a standing-place? We would not rob a single life of one real charm or one beautiful blessing, but we cannot consent to call it real temperance when the lover of the cup pleads for the right to use wine, beer, or cider in "moderation." If these say to us,

"Let ye who are so puling weak,
So lost to self-reliance,
As not to trust your own resolve to bid excess defiance,
Drink if you will of pumps and wells,
Lest use of wine should hurt you;
We'll taste the blessings heaven has sent,
Nor think DENIAL VIRTUE."

We would earnestly and pleadingly respond that it is all a mistake. Heaven sends not wine any more than it does rattlesnakes or tarantulas. The world is full of good and evil, and reason and experience must be a guide in our selection of what is best for our use and pleasure. To these moderate tipplers we would say,

"You whose fitful passions rove,
From new to newer beauty,
Drink to your changeful loves in wine, and scorn the charms of duty,
We drink, 'The mild domestic hearth,'
'The Wife,' 'The Son,' 'The Daughter,'
'The bright firesides of honest men,'
And here's to them—in water."

When we convince people that temperance is total abstinence from all fermented drink, and that true happiness is only enjoyed by the temperate, our work will be done, and well done, and we can bring a long array of scholarly and scientific names to our aid in doing this very thing.

Prof. Edward I. Youmans, in his "Class Book of Chemistry," page 326, speaking of the action of alcohol, remarks that "it is a disturber of the healthy functions, a disorganizer of the structure, and must therefore be ranked among medicins and poisons." And Prof. James Johnston, in his "Chemistry of Common Life," vol. i, page 289, says: "But the peculiar danger attendant upon the consumption of intoxicating drinks arises from their extreme seductivness and from the all but unconquerable strength of the drinking habit when once formed. Their peculiar malignity appears, where they hav once obtained a mastery, in their becoming the parent and nurse of every kind of suffering, immorality, and crime."

In view of all this, it is our duty as reformers to take the ground of total abstinence, even though we be called "bigots and fanatics." Alcohol has worked our country more ruin than any other one evil ever has, because it is the main cause of nearly all other forms of intemperance and crime. If we need any laws at all we need one to prohibit the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic liquors in this country. Every license to manufacture or sell it is only giving lawful permission for the making of drunkards. The little alcohol that is necessary for scientific or medical purposes should be made and sold by the government and by government officials, so that no profit could possibly accrue from it to the seller.

In speaking of church-members having done so little toward the real advance of teetotalism, I should except the Friends, or Quakers, who hav at last taken solid ground on this question, as I see by the Friends' Review of Philadelphia, which says: "Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, like all the similar meetings in the United States, has long been a temperance organization, but at its late session it became a total abstinence society. The able address on temperance issued by the meeting for sufferings had taken ground in favor of total abstinence and prohibition through local option laws; and it was felt that no lower position should be occupied toward our own membership. Hence the Yearly Meeting has requested its subordinate meetings to make inquiry of all the members as to their use of intoxicating liquors as a drink, and tenderly advise such as may use them to abstain."

In considering whether an individual has a right to use alchohol or tobacco there is another point to be taken in view. That is its effects on others. When a man becomes a devotee to these stimulants he blunts all the finer senses of smell and taste. He can no longer breathe the pure clean, fresh air with the same zest the temperance man can. The piney smell of the woods, the soft perfume of the clover field and rich fragrance of the floral world hav all become dulled and tame; the food he eats no longer givs up to him its rich, succulent juices in their perfection, and as if this were not enough, he is condemned to pollute the air for others with his cigar or pipe, and even the effluvia of his breath or the stench from his clothes!

His everlasting chew, chew, chew, and spit, spit, spit, is an intolerable nuisance. The books he reads and papers he handles all giv off the same disgusting scent of tobacco or rum.

If men will not and cannot control these appetites we must hav lawmakers who will make it compulsory upon them.

In order to preserve their sons from the habits of drunkards, the ancient Spartans made one of their most degraded slaves drunk, and led him through the streets as a spectacle for disgust and ridicule. In the United States the picture is reversed—the wealthy employer becomes drunken on wine, and the honest laborer pities while he laughs at his drunken actions. But I never feel like laughing at a drunken man. It hurts me too much. I think of what he might be and of the loved ones whose hearts are anguished and torn by his sad fall from what should be a noble and beautiful manhood.

Brother and sister Liberals, let us each one do a little to bring on the glad day when real reformers shall rule and govern our land and sit in the legislativ halls of the nation. If men hav heretofore failed, let woman take warning now that the hour of her reign is upon us. She has not been altogther guiltless in the evil work, but has led with soft, winning art many a man to drink his first cup.

"I see a beautiful lady stand
To pour the wine with a jeweled hand,
For a tall, dark man with flashing eye,
Who bows and drains the goblet dry,
Then leads her forth to talk of love
While the wistful stars keep watch above.
Oh, beautiful wine!

"Beautiful wine, thy years pass on,
The smile from the lady's face is gone,
In its stead I see a world of care
And I catch the tones of an anguished prayer,
As she listens beside the midnight grate
For the step of him who comes so late;
I see by the feeble taper's gloom
The spirit of want pervades the room;
But hush! he comes from his midnight lair,
I hear him climbing the narrow stair,
He brings the stench of the wine-mad crowd,
He curses the watcher in sorrow bowed,
Oh, beautiful wine!"

As we hav sown so must we reap, but may we each day sow better seed than in the past, and come up higher and higher into the light.

Book Notice.

THE ORIGIN OF MAN: A Tale of Tails. By J. R. Monroe, M.D.

The first element of poetry is life. Without this culture is of no avail, or thought even, for life is deeper than thought. It is the spirit of the universe, and unless one is somehow touched and thrilled with this spirit he cannot write poetry. The heart of things must be in him—the fire of nature and the eloquence of its movements. No dull repetitions can make poetry. Poetry is not an echo. It is not the music of a shell. It is an original spontaneous motion. It is that which comes from the inmost recesses of universal power. I think that life in itself is poetical, that is, rythmical. The natural expression of life is melodious. The reason we hav so much jar and discord in the world is because we hav so little life. That which makes for order and harmony is life. To make things better we must make them more lively.

Whenever a genuin expression of life comes to the surface there is poetry. The infant is almost always a poet, and so is the savage, and that is the reason why poetry is so brilliant in the earlier stages of the world. Though ruder the people, they hav more life, more intense action. As they become civilized they become more formal, and so more stupid, and hence prosaical. As in the case of Samson, they cut off their hair and lose their strength. The barber is very apt to shave off our manhood with our beard. For all that, however, we do not believe that long hair is necessary nowadays to the production of poetry, nor indeed is savagery or barbarism necessary. Civilization can and will in its own way produce an immensity of life. So we can still continue to wear good clothes and hav a clean face without despairing altogether of producing an epic.

Poetry as an art is the musical expression of life, and so poetry is capable of endless growth. Its harmonies can be multiplied and be truly marvelous in their flow and interflow, as witness the lyrics of Swinburne. But mere music is not the highest poetry. There must be energy, a mighty spirit, an impetuous thought. The poetry of to-day runs almost altogether to music and seems to sacrifice life. Poets surpass in expression but they lack the original fire. They do not draw it from heaven, but rather from books, and so get it second-hand. I think the poetry of to-day is the most melodious that the world has ever enjoyed, but at the same time I think it is not the strongest, with the exception of course of the viril poetry of Walt Whitman.

Dr. Monroe is essentially a poet. He has plenty of life. He throbs with it. He is not an imitator. He is an original man. He knows things at first-hand. He has been into the temple of nature himself. He has really seen the muses in the woods and by the streams; and so he can giv genuin pictures of their naked loveliness. He has not merely seen them as prim formalities in books. He knows them, we might say, by heart, because he has met them in the shadow of the everlasting rocks and beneath the boundless sky. He has looked into the mystic glory of their untamed soul, as their wild eyes hav met his in the storm and sunshine of veritable nature.

Dr. Monroe is a New World poet. He is like Whitman and Joaquin Miller. He derives his inspiration from our vast continent. He has nothing of the dreamy orientalism. He has the Western outlook. He smacks of the prairies, and he givs us a taste of the big lakes and rivers. His speech is plain and manly. It is not Tennysonian. He has no subtle melodies, no linked sweetness long drawn out. Like Marc Antony, he speaks right on. He is not equivocal. We know what he means. He does not deal in learned obscurities. He does not stretch his thought out so thin that we lose the clue and float on a sea of melody we know not whither.

Dr. Monroe's energy is superior to his music; that is, he is not the perfect master of the art of expression in poetic phrase. He does not touch the highest word-harmonies; but it would be wrong to say that he is not musical, for he is, and we can say that he has produced a genuin poem. Its movement is like the wild dash of a mountain brook, and while somewhat broken, it flows free and full. It does not lag, but leaps along with joyous recklessness.

He touches upon an immensity of topics, and he givs a kaleidoscopic view of evolution, and everything that has taken place since the beginning of time gets a report from his vigorous pen. The poor ministers hav to take it; they are pelted with rhymes, and they are not roses either, but some of them hard cobblestones that must do execution. The monkeys hav a fair show, and their tails are by no means left in the background. We realize what we might hav been in the long ago when our ancestors are thus flung before us with such jingling melodies. The poet certainly makes us feel quite interested in their welfare and the manner in which their tails disappear and "reform" inaugurated. It is a "Divine Comedy" indeed.

One must read the book in order to know all its excellent qualities. It is full of spice, and meat too. It has an earnest purpose. The gist of it is the following stanza, which shows the pervading spirit of the poem, and also its strength of movement and general melody of expression. We giv it as a "specimen brick:"

"A perfect god would make a perfect man;
A god of justice make his creature just;
A god all-powerful would perfect his plan,
And nothing to the chance of failure trust.
A god all goodness would not set his ban
Of endless torture on his child of dust,
Nor would a god of peace hav planted strife
In the chief creatures that he called to life."

The Freethinkers' Convention and Other Matters.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On account of inflammation of my eyes I hav been compelled, for the present, to leave off my labors on the Infidel Pulpit and return home. I hav decided not to issue any large posters this year for the Freethinkers' Convention, but will endeavor to get it as thoroughly advertised in other ways that will not involve so much expense and labor. The convention will be held, as heretofore announced, at Hornellsville, N. Y., the 31st day of August and the three following days. The railroad and hotel accomodations will be the same as last year. A large majority of our ablest speakers hav already agreed to be present, and I am confident from what I learn that it will be the most numerously attended convention the Freethinkers hav ever held.

From now to the time of the convention I shall devote myself to making arrangements for and advertising the convention and in canvassing for the Infidel Pulpit, THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Boston Investigator, and other Liberal papers throughout the western, central, and southern part of the state of New York. I will giv a free lecture at any place on the line of the Erie R. R. or any of its branches where friends will provide me a place to speak. For the present I can be addressed at Salamanca, N. Y.

H. L. GREEN.

P. S.—Allow me to request every person interested in the success of the Freethinkers' Convention to prepare a short notice of the same and get it published in his or her local journal.

CHRISTIANITY, not being a revelation but a conception—the gospels not being either inspired or accurate, but fallible and imperfect human records—the practical conclusion from such premises must be obvious to all. Every doctrin and every proposition which the scriptures contain, whether or not we believe it to hav come to us unmutilated and unmarred from the mouth of Christ, is open and must be subjected to the scrutiny of reason. Some tenets we shall at once accept as the most perfect truth that can be received by the human intellect and heart; others we shall reject as contradicting our instincts and offending our understandings; others, again, of a more mixed nature, we shall analyze, that so we may extricate the seed of truth from the trash of error, and elicit, to use the words of Fechter, "the divine idea that lies at the bottom of appearance. —Greg's "Creed of Christendom."

enjoy for her separate use after marriage, becomes void as soon as she has married. All covenants for the wife's benefit must be made with some one else, and the husband must covenant with some other man, or unmarried woman, who acts as trustee for the wife. This is the fundamental wrong from which all others flow, 'Husband and wife are one person, and that one is the husband.' The wife's body, her reputation, are no longer her own. She can gain no legal redress for injury, for the law does not recognize her existence, except under cover of her husband's suit. In some cases more modern legislation has so far become conscious of her as to protect her against her husband, and if this protection separates her from him, it leaves her the more entirely at the mercy of the world.

"Very curious results flow, in criminal law, from this supposition that the husband and wife are only one person. They are incompetent—except in a few special instances—to give evidence for or against each other in criminal cases; if a woman's husband be one of the several defendants, indicted together, the woman cannot give evidence either for or against any of them. When the wife of an accomplice is the only person to confirm her husband's statement, the statement falls to the ground, as in practice confirmation thereof is required. In the case of Rex v. Neal (7 C., p. 168) Justice Park said, 'Confirmation by the wife is, in this case, really no confirmation at all. The wife and the accomplice must be taken as one for this purpose. The prisoners must be acquitted.'"

The same author further on shows that "a married woman is not protected by the law in the 'uninterrupted enjoyment of her "limbs," her "body," or her "reputation." On the contrary, if a wife be injured in her person, or her property, she can bring no action for redress without her husband's concurrence, and in his name as well as her own' (Blackstone, p. 443). If in a railway accident a married woman has her leg broken she cannot sue the railway company for damages; she is not a damaged person; in the eyes of the law she is a piece of damaged property, and the compensation is to be made to her owner. If she is attacked and beaten, she cannot summon her assailant; her master suffers loss and inconvenience by the assault on his housekeeper, and his action is necessary to obtain redress. If she is libeled she cannot protect her good name, for she is incapable by herself of maintaining an action. In fact it is not even needful that her name should appear at all in the matter. 'The husband may sue alone for the loss of his wife's society by injury done to her, or for damage to her reputation' (Comyn's Digest, under 'Baron and Feme')."

"If a wife be separated from her husband, either by deed or judicial decree, she has no remedy for injury or for libel, unless by the doubtful plan of using her husband's name without his consent. On this injustice Lord Lyndhurst, speaking in the House of Lords in 1856, said: 'A wife is separated from her husband by a decree of the ecclesiastical court, the reason for that decree being the husband's misconduct—his cruelty, it may be, or his adultery. From that moment the wife is almost in a state of outlawry. She may not enter into a contract, or, if she do, she has no means of enforcing it. The law, so far from protecting, oppresses her. She is homeless, helpless, hopeless, and almost wholly destitute of human rights. She is liable to all manner of injustice, whether by plot or by violence. She may be wronged in all possible ways and her character may be mercilessly defamed, yet she has no redress. She is at the mercy of her enemies. Is that fair? Is it honest? Can it be vindicated upon any principle of justice, of mercy, or of common humanity?"

"A married woman loses control over her own body; it belongs to her owner, not to herself; no force, no violence, on the husband's part in conjugal relations is regarded as possible by the law; she may be suffering, ill, it matters not; force or constraint is recognized by the law as rape in all cases save that of marriage; the law "holds it to be felony to force even a concubine or harlot' (Broom's Commentaries, vol. iv., p. 255), but no rape can be committed by a husband on a wife; the consent given in marriage is held to cover the life, and if, as sometimes occurs, a miscarriage or premature confinement be brought on by the husband's selfish passions, no offense is committed in the eye of the law, for the wife is the husband's property, and by marriage she has lost the control over her own body. The English marriage law sweeps away all the tenderness, all the grace, all the generosity of love, and transforms conjugal affection into a hard and brutal legal right.

"By the common law the husband has a right to inflict corporeal punishment on his wife, and although this right is now much restricted, the effect of the law is seen in the brutal treatment of wives among the rougher classes, and the light—sometimes no—punishment inflicted on wife-beaters. The common law is thus given by Blackstone: 'The husband also (by the old law) might give his wife moderate correction. For as he is to answer for her misbehavior, the law thought it reasonable to entrust him with this power of restraining her, by domestic chastisement, in the same moderation that a man is allowed to correct his apprentices or children. The lower rank of people, who were always fond of the old common law, still claim and exert their ancient privilege.' Blackstone grimly adds, after saying this is all for woman's protection, 'So great a favorite is the female sex of the laws of England' (444 and 445). This 'ancient privilege' is very commonly exercised at the present time. A man who dragged his wife out of bed (1877) and, pulling off her night-dress, roasted her in front of the fire, was punished (?) by being bound over to keep the peace for a short period. Men who knock their wives down, who dance on them, who drag them out by the hair, are condemned to brief terms of imprisonment, and are then allowed to resume their marital authority and commence a new course of ill treatment" (Marriage).

The same able writer, by full quotations from Blackstone, Comyn's "Digest," etc., shows that the common (Christian) law empowers husbands to imprison their wives or to deprive them of their liberty; to prevent the wives from keeping such company as the husbands disapprove of; also the very great disabilities of woman under the same Christian law with regard to holding property and the rights of property, all showing conclusively that Christianity, so far from elevating woman, has for hundreds of years crushed her into terrible and almost hopeless slavery; but space will not admit of further quotations.

In my last letter I made a brief allusion to the horrid monstrosities perpetrated upon immense numbers of women under the false name of "witchcraft." I showed how 400 females were publicly burnt on one occasion, 800 under a single judge, 600 in one small bishopric, 900 in another, 7,000 at Treves, 1,000 at Como, 500 at Geneva, 100,000 under Francis I., and that the enormous number of 9,000,000 women are estimated to have been put to shocking, cruel deaths because Christians had adjudged them witches. This is a very striking exemplification of how much Christianity has done to elevate and bless woman. This false charge of witchcraft was a very convenient one when Christian husbands wished to get rid of their unattractive wives. They had only to accuse their wives of being witches, and the marriage tie was dissolved, and a most cruel death to the wife was sure to follow. In Protestant and Catholic countries alike this monstrous and most inhuman treatment was kept up for hundreds of years. Christian husbands and fathers were often called upon from the pulpit to bring witches to justice, which meant a terrible death. Women were chiefly accused of witchcraft, a wizard being seldom mentioned. Where one wizard was arrested, one hundred females were murdered as witches, and usually women advanced in years, who were no longer alluring to the sensual passions of Christian men.

The clergy constantly taught the inherent wickedness of woman, and that she was in league with the devil. Women were often charged with marrying the devil, and that charge was always sufficient to insure conviction and a speedy and cruel death. The most cruel means were resorted to by Christian persecutors to compel arrested females to confess themselves witches. One of the most powerful incentives to confess was persistently to deprive the tormented victims of their natural sleep. Iron collars, or "witches bridles," are still preserved in various parts of Europe which were used in the triumphant days of Christianity for preventing the agonized victims from getting a little natural sleep. These instruments were so constructed that by means of a loop which passed over the head a piece of iron having four points or prongs was forcibly thrust into the mouth, two of them being directed to the tongue and palate, the others pointing outward to each cheek. This infernal machine was secured by a padlock. At the back of the collar was fixed a ring by which to secure the witch to a staple in the wall of her cell. Thus equipped, and day and night waked and watched by a zealous, elevating Christian inquisitor, the wretched victim, after a few days and nights of such heavenly treatment, maddened by the torture and her forlorn, helpless position, was in a condition to confess anything in the hope of securing a cessation of this diabolical treatment. At intervals fresh examinations took place, and they were repeated from time to time, until the "contumacy" of the wretch was overcome and death finally came to the relief of the sufferer.

I can take the space to call attention to but a single case as a sample of thousands, that of Mrs. Allison Balfour. Not only herself, but her only son, her husband, and her little girls were grievously tortured in order to wring a confession from the wife and mother. This brave but unfortunate woman bore everything applied to herself, nor did the sufferings of her husband and son compel a confession of guilt. Not until her little daughter of seven or eight years was put to the torture in her presence did the constancy of the mother give way. To spare the innocent child, the equally innocent mother confessed herself a witch. After enduring all the agonies applied to herself, and all she was made to bear in the persons of her innocent family, she was still made to undergo the frightful suffering of death at the stake. She was one of those who died calling upon God for that mercy she could not find at the hands of Christian men. How vain was that appeal the reader can easily judge.

Remember there were thousands upon thousands of cases as terrible as this, and all in the name of Christianity, "the religion of love and benevolence." Here can be seen how this system of religion has worked to secure the elevation of woman; how it has struggled to establish Christian brotherhood among men. Let me ask, can woman be thankful enough for being so mercifully elevated by Christianity?

We clearly differ, Mr. Mair, as to the influence which Christianity has had upon woman. You insist that "Christianity alone has elevated woman to her proper position." This I pointedly deny. Woman lacks a great deal of occupying the position of equality with man which she should enjoy, although Christianity has been in existence nearly nineteen hundred years. If Christianity is an elevating element to woman it operates extremely slow. I have shown that woman enjoyed more liberty, more equality, more rights, in the pagan world than she enjoys to-day. Christianity has been the influence that has kept her from rising more rapidly in the scale of liberty and justice. It is Christian legislatures and Christian courts that have been far the most severe on woman, which have virtually made her a slave or a nonentity rather than an equal with the opposite sex. I have quoted sufficient from the first Christian judges and lawyers of the world to prove this, but ten times as much damaging proof of a similar kind could be given did time and space permit. The Pauline injunctions have been thoroughly exercised toward woman. All these Christian centuries woman has been compelled to submit herself to her husband and the church, to be a slave. She has been allowed no equality in liberty, independence, rights of property, and in political and social privileges. When Christianity rose to its greatest altitude of strength and power woman became the weakest, the most ignorant, the most degraded and enslaved, she has ever been in the civilized world. Christianity deprived her of her dearest rights, and condemned her every union with the other sex unless sanctioned and authorized by its oppressive priests. If she presumed to act up to the highest dictates of her nature and become a mother, unless a Christian priest authorized her to do so and performed a Christian ceremony over her, she was degraded to the lowest degree and made by the behests of Christianity the vilest thing that walked the earth. Woman has not been left free to choose her own position in society; she has only been allowed what the church saw fit to dispense to her; and in this Christianity has been her most cruel oppressor, and she can never rise to a degree of equal liberty, independence, and political and social rights until the rule, which still shrieks, "Women, submit yourselves!" is no longer the watchword and edict from the Christian church. Woman will have to rise in her might and intelligence and assert her rights in spite of the church and Christian legislation, and Christian justice, and help to put down this monstrous Christian wrong which for centuries has oppressed her, before she can ever enjoy that meed of liberty and equality for which nature fitted her.

Instead of Christianity doing great things for woman, the truth is directly in the opposite direction—woman is doing great things for Christianity. Christianity is sustained by woman to-day. But for woman the churches would not be attended, the religious fervor would not be kept up, the preachers and priests would not be paid, and the whole system of fraud and falsehood would collapse from inherent weakness and corruption in a very short period of time. So, instead of your claim that Christianity has done great things for woman it would be far more truthful and just for you to claim that woman is doing great things for Christianity.

It is my hope that woman will become so intelligent and so independent of priestly influence that she will be able to see how priestcraft and Christianity have degraded her and that she can never rise to a full degree of mental, social, and political liberty until she emancipates herself from the church and has a domain more extensive and grand for the exercise of her brilliant powers than obedience to Peter, Paul, and all the Christian popes, bishops, and priests from their time to the present. This is woman's great and only hope, to become free from the trammels of priests and priestly dogmas, from the musty myths of past dark ages, to free herself from the errors of ecclesiasticism and supernaturalism, to hav something besides priestly inanities and absurdities to engage her attention and to occupy the field of mental, social, and political freedom in common with the sterner sex. Then, and not until then, will woman reach the elevated position in the scale of humanity for which she is admirably fitted. It is Christianity which has been oppressing her for many centuries, and it is from Christianity that she must achieve her emancipation.

It is true that woman has made some advance in the world of thought and her condition has moderately improved, but it has not been done by Christianity, but in spite of it. It is just as false to claim that Christianity has elevated woman as it is to claim that Christianity has invented the printing-press, the steam-engine, the telegraph, that she has been the cause of the increase of knowledge, learning, science, liberty, antislavery, temperance, and human progress. We are very often told that Christianity has done all these things, but it is false every time it is uttered. These advances have been made because of the progressive character of man's nature and his aspiration to ascend higher and enjoy more life and liberty, and not from the effects of any creed, any set of dogmas, any number of myths and absurdities, any system of religion. All these have increased within the last three centuries, not because of Christianity, but despite it.

Much more could be said upon this subject, but I have already dwelt too long, and must close.

Yours truly, D. M. B.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $5 for the trip round the world. My best wishes go with you.

Respectfully, ENOS COOK.

JORDAN VALLEY, OR., June 19, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $8—$3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year and $5 for your trip round the world. Wishing you a pleasant journey, I remain Yours respectfully, WM. R. KING.

LOWELL, MASS., July 2, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I began to take THE TRUTH SEEKER four months ago, and I find that I can't get along without it, so please find inclosed $2, and when the eight months are up I will raise some more money somehow. I would gladly send you five dollars if it would keep you from your contemplated journey, for I can't help thinking that the paper will lose some of its vim when you are gone, but my best wishes will go with you, and I want to be classed among your most sincere friends.

Yours respectfully, DANA HILT.

CENTRE BELPER, O., June 29, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5 to help bear your expenses round the world. I am not in favor of your going, but if you must and will go I want the books. I think you can do more good by staying here in our own country. You hav accomplished a great deal of good, and there still remains a great deal more to be accomplished by just such men as you. Wishing you a pleasant trip and a safe return, I am Respectfully, MORGAN E. LEWIS.

PRAIRIE CITY, OR., June 18, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As you hav decided to undertake the journey, we wish to contribute our share toward the expenses, and herewith inclose money order for $5. That you may hav health and strength to complete so great an undertaking, and that the journey may prove both pleasant and profitable, is the earnest wish of Your sincere friends,

A. L. THOMPSON,
HESTER A. THOMPSON.

CARROLLTON, ILL., June 28, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Please accept postal order for $5 from one who has read your letters with much interest while you were in Europe. Now the time has nearly arrived for you to sail on your long voyage, I thought I would like very much to be a contributor. A safe and pleasant voyage, is the wish of ANN H. BRUCE.

ISLAND CITY, June 27, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find money order for $5, my part toward the round-the-world trip. May the elements be favorable; and that you will hav good health and enjoy the trip is my wish. Excuse my tardiness in forwarding my money, as I hav been away from home for the last six weeks.

Respectfully yours, W. H. DORRIT.

GREAT VALLEY, July 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find the $5 I promised to help in sending yourself sure round this little planet, and should your many respondents respond as promptly there will be little excuse for your tarrying much longer in the land of America, the once "land of the free and the home of the brave." Excuse me, for what will we do with the four million slaves? Oh, they are free now. Yes, physically; but mentally are there not nearly fifty million? Methinks so, hence you will see that I am in a quandary to designate her by a good word that she would not belie. Still we hav not lost all our fond recollections of her and would be glad to chant in her praise, to sing blithe and gay as of yore, to speak of her broad acres, her mighty domain, to garner her sons and daughters under the canopy of genial skies and rational thought, to abide forever in the conditions of harmony, and to become a member of the great and glorious republic whose law will be love, equity, and impartial justice. Yes, we would like to think well of our country, and were it not for the selfishness of human nature, which is so selfishly exacting as to rob others of their hard-earned gains, we should see and hear of less angry gods and cunning devils, popes, priests, preachers, deacons, and money monopolies, in the absence of whose teaching and preaching the world of mankind would be more rational, lovely, and harmonious. But as long as superstition, myth, and greed prevail there is bound to be ignorance, gross and blind at noonday, so that he who supplies their vitiated minds on credulity is in their morbid state the salt of the earth and the light of the world, whereas the facts are he is rank darkness surrounded with fleeting specters of his own creation.

But on the other hand the real man or woman of substance tangible and vital, rational and good, the real salt and light of the world, are ignored and discarded, and why? Because gross darkness, like a mantle thick, obscures the sun of truth that is bound sooner or later to penetrate the veil, giving freedom, liberty, equity, and justice to every son and daughter of this great human family; and when that time comes, for come it will, there will be rejoicing not only among the human servants, but the fowls of the air, the fishes of the sea, the mammal and creeping things will rejoice in newness of life; yea, the winds will become less piercing, the waves less destructiv and boisterous, the trees of the forest nod their long heads to the new condition, the grasses will put on a more velvety dress, the adamantin rock re-echo in one vast harmonious strain that Bennett has been here and the world is to know the truth. Yours, A. F. ALBRIGHT.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that one hundred and forty of the subscribers to the round-the-world fund are delinquent, so I will herewith inclose you $5 to help you along for that purpose. With my kindest regards, I remain

Your friend, CHAS. F. BLANDIN.

CENTRAL, S. C., July 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find money order for $5 from Capt. Wm. Hunter, Jr. This amount he sends you to assist you in making that grand circuit around the globe, and at the same time secure him an interest in the forthcoming volumes descriptiv of your sights and discoveries. Please place Capt. Hunter in the starry galaxy, and as I am too poor to appear there, please accept an affectionate good-bye if this should be the last you hear from me.

Fraternally, R. M. CASEY.

LEMOORE, June 25, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find thirteen dollars—three for THE TRUTH SEEKER to J. P. Ford, and five from him toward the journey round the world. Also five from myself for the same object. We await with great expectation the appearance of the pending volumes. May health and prosperity attend you. Yours truly, S. MORSE, M.D.

NEKOMA, June 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed you will find $5 for your trip around the world. Good-bye, friend Bennett; you hav the best wishes of myself and husband. I hope we are not sending you to destruction.

Very truly your friend, MATTIE OSTROM.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., May 20, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: I hav this moment taken your circular from the office, and before leaving hasten to respond, although in my "heart of hearts" I wish you'd stay at home and mind your own "biz." Honest, now, I can't bear the thought of your going, and did my best not to hav my liege-lord say he'd giv you anything. But enough; suffice it say here it is, and may great good result. Adieu.

Yours most thoroughly, ABBIE KNAPP.

PETALUMA, CAL., June 21, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: While in San Francisco lately, I called upon that old and stanch Liberal and labor agitator, John Ferral. He is now nearly eighty-one years old, and although he has to lie in bed all the time in consequence of a weakness of the back, yet his mind is as fresh and as vigorous as any other man at fifty years old. His reminiscences, extending beyond a half a century, are very interesting. He is a nativ of Belfast, and a descendant of a Huguenot family which emigrated to Ireland at a very early period. He was educated for a physician, but in studying chemistry he was thereby attracted to his father's manufacturing establishment, which was that of a weaver and dyer. He came to the United States in 1827, and became a convert of the celebrated Francis Wright, whose Liberal doctrins he still advocates. He is a great admirer of Thomas Paine, as well as of Thomas Jefferson. After he became a convert of Frances Wright he occupied his time in working at his trade and also in publishing some papers advocating the cause of labor, also in organzing labor unions and agitation in general. He many times broke down financially in his efforts to enlighten his fellow-man, but he always went to work at his trade until he could start printing again. You no doubt never heard of him, as he has been in California for nearly thirty years, and for the last ten years or so his bodily infirmities prevented him from doing much public work. Our friends of the Boston Investigator no doubt remember him well, as he used to be one of its correspondents. Barring the weakness in his back, he is pleasant, chatty, jovial, and very excellent company. No doubt many Liberals will be glad to learn that he is still in the land of the living. In fact, he laughs at the idea of dying. He says he is not old enough to die yet. He is very pleasantly surrounded hy his children and grandchildren. One of his sons, the Hon. Robert Ferral, is judge of the superior court in San Francisco. If any of the old Liberals who still may remember him would write him he no doubt would be pleased to answer them. His address is 828 Folsom street, San Francisco, Cal. PHILIP COWEN.

P. S.—In consideration of my asking you a favor I concluded to stretch a point and send you the $5 as my share toward the trip, for which you will send me the book or books. I inclose $10, which please acknowledge. P. C.

SHARON, WIS., June 20, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find the $5 I promised when you were to make a tour around the globe. I am only too proud to be one of the number to "chip in" and send the first heralder of free thought, free speech, and free press that was ever sent by any people to circumnavigate this planet. I wish you well, and shall wait impatiently for your return and for the book. WALTER N. KELLOGG.

ROCK SPRINGS, WYO., May 1, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: We still liv and enjoy a reasonable share of the blessings of this world, and as THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of our choicest luxuries, it is but just and right that it should be paid for; hence you will find inclosed $3. It is a little behind hand, but will take refuge behind the old addage, "Better late than never." With best wishes for you and yours, I close with an earnest desire for a long and glorious life for THE TRUTH SEEKER. W. S. WALTER.

STOCKTON, MO., May 4, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: After reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for several years I am surprised at the great number of people in our great country who entertain Liberal views, and also at the rapidity with which they are spreading, and after your conviction and Judge Comegy's charge to the grand jury in his state, I am inclined to the opinion that there is more freedom and less intolerance in the great and growing West than in the old eastern states, yet it is too true that there are a great many localities here where it requires a great deal of moral courage for a man to acknowledge that he is a Liberal. I believe THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing more, by its bold, outspoken manner, for the cause of Freethought than any other journal in our country. JAMES T. FERRIS.

PORTLAND, ME., June 17, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: When you first talked of making a trip around the world, I did not think favorably of your leaving your post of duty and taking such a long journey from home and friends. But now I am glad that you are going, and I hope that you may enjoy good health and be able to write up a book, or books, that will show up priestcraft and the shams of Christianity from the early ages of civilization to the present time.

I believe that such a history as you will write up by circumnavigating the earth will be the means of leading millions of unborn children from the paths of ignorance and superstition up on to the higher plains of life.

Put me down for the above history, for I want it to read and leave for my children to peruse in years to come. I hope and trust that when you leave the shores of America you may be spared to return to your nativ home and friends again, where you may long liv to reward sham Christianity for sending you to prison for daring to be a true man, ever looking and contending for the right. You may rest assured that when the winds and waves are bearing you over the rolling ocean, and fire and water harnessed together are speeding you over the plains and over valleys and mountains of the green old earth, a half million of true men and women will go with you and hope for your success, and wait to welcome you back to the shores of America, where they can clasp your hand and look into your face once more.

I remain forever your true friend and well wisher in the cause of free thought, free speech, and free press; yes, and free mails, H. A. LAMB, M.D.

Is There a God?

BY FRANK F. CRAMPTON.

Day's glowing beams are faded. O'er the lea
I wander, sadly thinking of the one
I a few hours past did see consigned
To his last resting-place, the grave, to pass
By nature's slow-consuming process back
Once more to dust, ne'er to rise again.
Ne'er to arise again? Tell me, O stars,
Is there a world, a heaven, above? Queen,
Thou who in majesty does roll so grand
Through the vast dome of blue, is there a world—
Is there a place far, far beyond the hight
Called "heaven," where bright angels sing sweet songs
Around a blazing throne, whereon in state
There sits a mighty being, and by man
Knelt to and worshiped as a God whose acts
Can but be just and right, and who does watch,
With eyes that only beam with love to all,
O'er the inhabitants of this world?

I fain would pierce
The great impossible—the vaults above—
And learn the secrets hidden there; to know
Beyond the peradventure of a doubt
The truth, "Is there a heaven, God, and angels?"

I gaze on nature. Round me spreads
The handiwork of some unknown. E'en now
There stretches far into the distance scenes
Which, though mute with grief I am, call forth
A cry of admiration, and again
The thought arises, "Who did this? A God?"
From nothing what can come? Yet we are taught
From infancy to blind believe that God
Created out of nothing something, placed
Upon this something man, and from his side
Extracted his companion, woman.

Pleased with this great labor, he betook himself
To a grand world above; descending soon
To damn this perfect work and to endow
Them and their progeny with an endless curse.

This is the history of one god's best work.
Can I believe such history as this?
Doubting, I wander—weeping for my friend—
Toward home. I'll place my trust in nothing.
Should I be wrong, my honsst thoughts must rise
And stand in dignity before such God—
Be judged and damned accordingly.

The Liberals' Demand.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

We Liberals by Comstock laws
Are victims made of bigots' hate;
Yes, martyrs to sweet freedom's cause,
For church in measure rules the state.

Her servil tools our rights usurp,
Dictate to us what we shall mail;
Condemn those books that hurt her power,
And thrust the authors into jail.

And men who sell the same are shoved
By church hounds into durance vile;
They howl a holy, virtuous howl
To cover up their priestly guile.

They slyly plan to grasp for power,
Their virtue's but an imposition;
They want to build in this free land
Another Holy Inquisition.

If obscene books they want to crush,
Not Liberals, this thought occurs:
Why don't they first begin at home,
And crush the Bible publishers?

Let any man of common sense
God's book with "Cupid's Yokes" compare;
To read in public some of God's
A decent man would hardly dare.

We freemen claim it is but right
That church and state should be divorced;
Our rights as sacred be as priests,
And laws impartially enforced.

We claim the mails should all be free,
A broad highway for public thought,
No priest or church should dare suppress
This right for which our fathers fought.

But if priests will fling by their books
Because of vileness they contain,
And law shuts down on obscene books,
No Liberal will then complain.

All filthy books we do despise;
They lie who say we such defend;
'Tis church encroachment that we fight,
To her vile sway we will not bend.

This is what Liberals demand:
Repeal those laws church bigots use
To crush Freethought and liberty,
Outlaw all books save bigots' views.

Zaccheus.

BY D. PRIESTLY.

As Christ was traveling to and fro,
He chanced to come to Jericho;
And behold, there dwelt a little man
Named Zaccheus—a publican.

Though Zaccheus was not tall,
He had more money than them all;
He did not labor for his dinner,
But gathered taxes—the old sinner!

And of course when he squared up his dockets
A great deal would stick in his pockets.
A crowd from Jerich came out
And circled Jesus round about.

And Zaccheus, being short, you know,
To see him didn't hav half a show;
So he just scrambled on before
And climbed into a sycamore.

When Jesus came beneath the tree
He looked and Zaccheus did see,
And said, "You see, I've come to town;
Make haste now, Zacche, and come down,

With you to-day I must abide."
And down came Zaccheus at his side.
The Jews all murmured much to see
Jesus select such company,

And thought it strange he would take dinner
With Zaccheus, who was a sinner.

But Zaccheus, though a sinful man,
Repenting he at once began.

"O Lord, I've been an evil-doer,
But half my goods I'll giv the poor;
And if I robbed from any man
Fourfold I will restore again."

Christ said, "To-day salvation's come
From heaven unto Zaccheus's home."
But sinners now, whatever their lot,
When they repent keep what they'v got.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

PLAIN HOME TALK,

EMBRACING

Medical Common Sense.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M.D.

This book is a plain talk about the human system, the habits of men and women, the causes and prevention of disease, our sexual relations and social natures. It is medical common sense applied to causes, prevention, and cure of chronic diseases, the natural relations of men and women to each other, society, love, marriage, parentage, etc. Embellished with two hundred illustrations. A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

12mo, 206pp. Price, $1.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's staudpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earuest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

SOCIALISM.

A Reply to Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D. By an Independent Socialist.

12mo, 67pp., paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translatiug his book so well.

WORLD-WIDE BLESSING TO WOMANKIND.

Only Article of the Kind in Use.

Harmless, Healthful and Infallibly Reliable.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Authony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF AMERICA.

It is a fact well known to every individual in this country that all new inventions hav been opposed by the very class of men who should make inquiry respecting the same. For instance, Fulton with his steamboat, and Stephenson with his locomotiv.
Then we had legislators in our Congress who looked upon Morse as a lunatic when he asked for a short line of telegraph between Baltimore and Washington. Yet today what should we do without our telegraph or steamboat and locomotiv?

THE INVENTORS OF ALL THESE THINGS HAV HAD TO BEAR THE INSULTS OF ALL SO-CALLED SCIENTISTS. WHY, EVEN SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, ONE OF THE GREATEST CHEMISTS THAT EVER LIVED—HE WITH ALL HIS LEARNING PROVED HIMSELF A FOOL WHEN HE RIDICULED THE IDEA OF LIGHTING OUR STREETS WITH GAS. HE SAID IT WAS AN IMPOSSIBILITY TO SO USE COAL GAS.

What to-day should we do without such a medium of light? Our sewing-machines—they were also opposed by those whose interest it was to oppose them. Thousands of instances may be quoted where articles now in daily use were ridiculed by the people whose interest it was to keep back the introduction of such inventions.

Now, then, as to the WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

THIS INVENTION IS AS NEW TO THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOOLYN AS WAS THE FIRST INTRODUCTION OF STEAM-ENGINS AND ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS, AND YET THE PEOPLE, ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, HAV NO MORE SENSE THAN TO ASK THEIR PHYSICIANS WHETHER OR NOT THEY SHALL WEAR WILSONIA GARMENTS. IT IS JUST AS REASONABLE TO ASK A COMMON TINKER TO MAKE YOU A GOLD WATCH, OR AN IDIOT TO SOLVE A MATHEMATICAL PROBLEM, AS TO ASK PRACTICING PHYSICIANS THEIR OPINION AS TO THE VALUE OF THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING. AND YET THIS INVENTION IS DESTINED TO OVERTHROW ALL FORMER METHODS OF TREATING DISEASE, AND OUR CHILDREN WILL WONDER HOW THEIR PARENTS COULD HAV BEEN SO HUMBUGGED AS TO POISON THEMSELVS WITH NOXIOUS DRUGS. PHYSICIANS THEMSELVS WHO HAV ADVANCED IN LIFE KNOW VERY WELL THAT MEDICIN IS A MISTAKE.

We hav in Brooklyn cases of diseases cured that hav been given over by the very best physicians, so called, in the city of Brooklyn. In the testimonies given below you hav the names of five Brooklyn physicians who had given over the patient to die.
Read these testimonials and then let these physicians answer why they fail to cure. Read Dr. Mansfield's evidence; also the evidence of Peter Lehlback, of Jersey City, whom fifty physicians of New Jersey and New York gave over as incurable. Let these doctors explain why they failed to cure after four years of medical practice, costing that poor man $15,000. And yet the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, which they dared condemn, are all sufficient to cure in two months.

I WILL GIV ANY PHYSICIAN IN BROOKLYN $5,000 IF HE CAN DISPROVE ALL I SAY IN REFERENCE TO THE VALUE OF THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM IN TREATING DISEASE, AND WILL ALSO UNDERTAKE TO CURE NINE-TENTHS OF ALL HIS INCURABLES, FREE OF CHARGE, PROVIDED HE REGISTERS THE NAMES OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME.

I will also giv any patient $5,000 who has worn [my goods in quantity and time as I direct and has not received all the benefit I promised.

Read the following among the many testimonies given as to the virtues of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING:

HÆMATEMESIS.

[Bleeding from mucous membrane of Throat and Stomach.]

This almost seems incredible. But, nevertheless, this patient has come under the personal observation of Dr. Thayer, as well as all the others who have addressed their letters to him, and he affirms the truth of all they claim.

BROOKLYN, April 30, 1881.

DR. THAYER, My Dear Sir: I was first taken sick about the 15th of February, 1880. My first attack was like this: I coughed up two or three mouthfuls of blood, when I called a physician, who prescribed for hemorrhage from the lungs. I recovered slightly. Three weeks after I was awakened in the night with a cough, finding my mouth full of blood. Continued to spit blood for two days before it could be controled, which left me very weak. Recovered just enough to get around again in a very weakened condition.
Whenever I would stoop to pick up anything the blood would come up into my mouth.
Drs. Shirwell and McEvette both declared that I could never recover again. From July, 1880, to September 29, 1880, I was occasionally spitting up blood. Was suddenly taken sick one night while in the street. This attack of bleeding continued for twenty-four days. Spitting? No; I should better describe it by saying vomiting up blood with every cough. Dr. Sheppard was called in and said it was not possible for me to liv till spring—that I shouldn't live till April, 1881. Dr. Dower said he had done for me all he could. Dr. Carreau said one of my lungs was gone—THAT I COULD NOT RECOVER.
Early in March, 1881, I gave up the doctors in disgust. Upon the 21st of March, 1881, the "WILSONIA" appliances were put on me while I was in bed, as I was too weak to leave the same. Four days before this time, I—also my friends—thought I was dying.
Upon the 26th of March, 1881, I felt strong enough to get up and dress myself for the first time in three months. Then upon April 8, 1881, I was strong enough to ride two miles and call upon Mr. Wilson.
Now, three weeks since that time, I feel strong enough to WALK THAT DISTANCE. I have had no HEMORRHAGES since I put on the Appliances, and feel my strength growing better and better each day; in fine, I feel stronger and better than I have since I was first taken sick. Yours respectfully,
MICHAEL MARRION,
458 Third avenue, Brooklyn.

DR. THAYER, Dear Sir: It was about eighteen years ago that I was first attacked with sciatica, which developed into chronic rheumatism I hav employed allopathy, homeopathy, electricity, and, in fact, ALL PATHYS. Hav employed the best medical skill in Brooklyn and Troy, New York, but they never cured me.
I commenced to wear the "WILSONIA" just before the holidays [but had no faith in them], with this result: I am stronger, sleep better, hav a better appetite, have increased in flesh and weight, feel better, AM BETTER. Have slept on hop pillows, and done almost everything for my previous nervous prostration, all of which I hav no need for now since wearing the "WILSONIA" Garments. Yours truly,
MRS. JANE SCOTT,
332 Clinton street, Brooklyn.

We place our Electro Magnetic Appliance on the body, and we succeed in influencing the internal organs, tissues, fluids, etc., by acting directly on the arterial blood, which absorbs a due amount of the magnetic force, thus invigorating the whole system, there being no cell or tissue unpenetrated by the blood. It is impossible to estimate the number of persons who lose their life from a neglect of the conditions necessary for its preservation.

NASAL CATARRH AND OBESITY.

BROOKLYN, May 30, 1881.

PROFESSOR WILSON, Dear Sir: All my life long I hav sufferred from nasal catarrh. Three months ago you persuaded me to wear your Magnetic Clothing. The offensiv disease is nearly eradicated, and I can read aloud, sing, or go up and down stairs with comparativ ease—something I hav not done in years without weariness. I was also annoyed with an excess of fat. Much of this has abated, and I hav gained a proportionate degree of muscular strength I measure over three inches less around the body—below the waist—since wearing your Garments.
I supposed that during the warm weather they would be burdensome. On the contrary, I am as comfortable as the present oppressiv heat will permit any one to be in ordinary dress. MRS. E. G. CHIPMAN,
7 Bond street.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

[CASE OF PROFESSOR HATCH SMITH.]

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much, in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.
Desirous of knowing what Dr. Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

THE FAR-FAMED "WILSONIA."

moves grandly on, conquering and to conquer every form of disease known to men. It triumphs over even the most complicated forms within the short space of ten or twelve months. Read the following glowing tribute from the ready pen of the world-renowned Dr. Mansfield, of New York. It was received to-day:

61 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET, N. Y., April 9, 1881.

DEAR WILSON: I am pleased to inform you that I am quite well from the use of your appliances. Fifteen days since I could not walk more than a quarter of a mile without resting. To-day I can walk three miles without fatiguing me in the least. I only wish that those who suffer as I did could know the efficacy of the "WILSONIA" as I do.
Mrs. Mansfield has been and now is under the care of a celebrated physician, and up to yesterday has been suffering from debility attended with much pain Last evening I proposed to take my magnetic suit and put it upon her. She consented, and had not it upon her body over ten minutes before she acknowledged she was free from pain. She slept well all night, without experiencing the slightest pain whatever. I regret I hav not two suits, but I will put mine on her again to-night. I dare not go without it myself during the day time. Several ladies hav called on Mrs. M. this morning, and her theme is the "WILSONIA."
I hav sent your representativ on Broadway several customers already, and in every case I tell them you MUST DRESS them as YOU DEEM prudent. I hav two more on the "anxious seat" that will be converted soon. I hope to send you a $1,000 worth of customers this year.
God bless you, dear WILSON, for what you hav done and are doing for suffering humanity.
Respectfully, J. V. MANSFIELD.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

(The patient taken off from crutches.)

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

MY DIFFICULTY IS THAT MANY PERSONS WILL BECOME ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, WILL SWALLOW MEDICIN ENOUGH TO FLOAT A STEAMSHIP, AND RUB IN LINIMENTS AND OINTMENTS ENOUGH TO TAN THE SKIN TILL IT BECOMES LIKE THE SAIL OF A SHIP; AND THEN, HEARING OF MY MARVELOUS CURES, WILL EXPECT, ON PUTTING ON MY GOODS, TO JUMP INTO NEW LIFE IN TWO OR THREE MONTHS. THIS IN MOST CASES IS AN IMPOSSIBILITY, AND PERSONS GOVERNED BY SUCH EXPECTATIONS HAD BETTER NOT WASTE THEIR TIME OR MY OWN IN CALLING UPON ME.

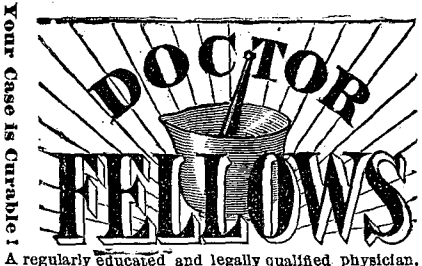
FRIENDS OF THE SICK POOR OF BROOKLYN,

Enforce your physicians and the Charity Commissioners of Brooklyn to accept my offer to them in your behalf.
I renew it here as follows:

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

MULTIFORM DISEASE CLASSIFIED,

And the range of price for the "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits warranted to effect a cure in every case, when the suit is worn continuously for the space of twelve months—frequently will do this in half that time.



All forms of PULMONARY DISEASE, such as Phthisis Pulmonalis, or Consumption, Bronchial Hemorrhage, Pulmonary Hemorrhage, Croupous Pneumonia, Catarrhal Pneumonia, Induration, or Hardening of the Lung, Bronchial Asthma, Tussis Convulsiver, or Whooping Cough, Inflammation of the Pleura, or Pleurisy, Hydro-Thorax, or Water in the Chest, Pneumo-Thorax, or Air in the Chest, Epitaxis, or Bleeding from the Nose.
The above forms of disease require "Wilsonia" Magnetic suits which aggregate in cost from $38.50 to $73.50, according to the precise character of the disease and condition of the patient. These same conditions govern or determin the quantity of goods and their aggregate cost in every case mentioned in the following classes:
All forms of Cardiac, or HEART DISEASE, require magnetic suits ranging in price from $38.50 to $73.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of DIGESTION, such as Diphtheritic Inflammation of the Pharynx, Syphilitic Affections of the Pharynx, Inflammation of the Œsophagus, Stricture of the Œsophagus, Acute Gastric Catarrh, or Acute Catarrh of the Stomach, Gastritis, or Inflammation of the Stomach, Carcinoma, or Cancer of the Stomach, Hematomesis, or Hemorrhage of the Stomach, Dyspepsia, Scrofulous and Tuberculous Diseases of the Intestins and Mesenteric Glands, Colic, Gastric Fever, Neuralgia of the Stomach and Intestins, Peritonitis.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $93.50.
All forms of Disease of the Liver and Bile-Ducts, such as Hyperemia, or Enlargement of the Liver, Acute Yellow Atrophy of the Liver, Tuberculosis of the Liver, Cirrhosis of the Liver, Acute and Chronic Hepatitis, or Acute and Chronic Inflammation of the Liver, Fatty Liver, Cancer of the Liver, etc.
The above require suits costing from $38.50 to $83.50.
All forms of disease of the kidneys, such as Hemorrhage of the Kidneys, Acute Bright's Disease, Parenchymatous, or Chronic Bright's Disease, Carcinoma, or Cancer of the Kidneys, Renal Calculus, or Stones in the Kidneys, Hematuria Vesicalis, or Hemorrhage of the Bladder, Incontinence of Urine and all diseases of the Sexual organs, Ovaritis, or Inflammation of the Ovary, Ovarian Tumor, Catarrh of the Uterus, Displacement of the Uterus, Parenchymatous Metritis, or Acute Inflammation of the Uterus, Tumors of the Uterus, Anomalis, or Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Catarrh of the Vagina, Leucharrh.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $108.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the NERVOUS SYSTEM, such as Softening of the Brain, Hemaphlega, or Paralysis of the Lateral Halves of the Body, Pariphlegia, or Paralysis of the Upper or Lower Half of the Body, Paralysis Agitans, or Shaking Palsy, Apoplexy, Cerebral Hemorrhage, Cerebritis, or Inflamation of the Brain, Cerebro-Spinal Meningitis, Sclerosis of the Brain, Hydrocephalus Acquisitus, or Water on the Brain Acquired, Hydrocephalus Congenitus, or Water on the Brain from Birth, Myelitis, or Inflammation of the Spinal Marrow, Hemorrhage of the Spinal Cord, or Spinal Apoplexy, Tabes Dorsualis, or Consumption of the Spinal Cord, Locomotor Ataxia, or Progressiv Grey Degeneration of the Posterior Columns of the Spinal Cord, Ticdouloureux, Neuralgia, Neuralgia Ischia Dica, or Sciatica, Chorea, or St. Vitus' Dance, Trismus, or Lock-jaw. Epilepsy, or Falling Sickness, Eclampsia Infantum, Hysteria, Catalepsy, Hypochondriasis.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $150.00.
All forms of DISEASE of the SKIN, such as Eczema and its several varieties, require suits costing from $48.50 to $73.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of LOCOMOTION, such as Rheumarthrisis Acute, or Flying Gout, Acute Articular Rheumatism, Chronic Articular Rheumatism, Deformities of the Joints, Gout, Progressiv Muscular Atrophy.
The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $200.00.
All forms of ACUTE and CHRONIC INFECTIOUS DISEASE, such as Measles, Scarlet Fever, Small Pox, Chicken Pox, Typhus Fever, Typhoid Fever, Relapsing Fever, Intermittent Fever, Dysentery, Syphilis, Congenital and Hereditary.
The above require magnetic suits costing $93.00.
All DISORDERS OF NUTRITION which do not depend upon Infection, such as Chlorisis, Scrofula, Diabetes (both varieties), Scarbutus, or Scurvy, etc.

The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $68.50.
HERNIA requires Magnetic Appliances costing from $53.50 to $93.50.
VARICOSE VEINS require Magnetic Appliances costing from $58.50 to $108.50.

N. B.—When "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits are ordered to be forwarded by mail or express [they should go by express wherever practicable], do not neglect to state the size of head, of the waist, the wrist, and length of the foot of the person for whom they are ordered. All checks and post-office orders should be made payable to William Wilson, 465 Fulton street. Brooklyn. N. Y.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.
Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:
"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."
The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. E. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."
Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.
Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,
Vineland, N. J.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.
This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

"The Gods and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," "Heretics and Heresies." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.

"The Ghosts and Other Lectures."

CONTENTS.—"The Ghosts," "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," "Declaration of Independence," "Farming in Illinois," "Speech at Cincinnati," "The Past Rises Before Me Like a Dream." Price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents.
Both volumes bound in one, price, paper, $1.00.

"What Must We Do to be Saved?"

"Interpolations are the foundation stones of every orthodox church." Thoroughly revised and corrected by the author. Price, 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

CATHOLICS care little more for Sunday than they do for the Bible; both are held to be of far less importance than the authority of the church and the dicta of the bishops and priests. Sunday, in Catholic countries, is a grand gala day. A few go to mass in the morning, and after that they can amuse themselvs by card-playing, drinking beer, going into the fields and woods, going hunting, riding about, or almost anything else they wish to. It is only the Puritan Protestants that make such a senseless fuss about the rigid observance of Sunday, and they hav not the slightest authority for it. Neither Christ, the apostles, nor the early fathers ever enjoined the keeping of the Sabbath. All that these Puritans find in the Bible to found their Sunday bigotry upon is, "Remember the Sabbath day," etc.; but that referred to Saturday, and not Sunday, and no authority can be shown from any source worthy of attention why Saturday was set aside and Sunday substituted in its place.—Bennett's Infidel Abroad.

AN orthodox newspaper of large circulation and wide influence has told us that "the Puritan Sabbath is not threatened, not going, but gone." The clergy, however, will make desperate efforts to recover it, in view of the hold upon the people thus afforded them. Ministers are men, and the need of dutiful attendance by the people on their ministrations is as great to them as of clients to a lawyer or of customers to a shopkeeper. Finding that a popular conviction that church-going is a duty is indispensable to the continuance of their influence, they first manufacture the duty, and then manufacture a scriptural warrant for it; and their systematic use of these misrepresentations has so befogged the minds of their people that not one church-member in ten understands the teaching of either Hebrew or Christian scripture in regard to Sabbatical observance. Not one in ten of them understands that the Old Testament specifies Saturday as the obligatory time for the weekly Sabbath, or that the New Testament, leaving the observance of that day optional to each individual, neither enjoins nor recommends the observance of any other day.—Index.

THE most malignant feelings which enter into the present struggle between capital and labor hav been generated, especially in England, by the ostentation of idle wealth in contrast with surrounding poverty. No really high nature covets such a position as that of a luxurious and useless millionaire. Communism, as a movement, is a mistake; but there is a communism which is deeply seated in the heart of every good man and which makes him feel that the hardest of all labor is idleness in a world of toil, and the bitterest of all bread is that which is earned by the sweat of another man's brow.—Goldwin Smith.

AND from the prayer of want and plaint of woe
Oh, never, never turn away thine ear.
Forlorn in this bleak wilderness below,
Ah, what were man should heaven refuse to hear?
To others do (the law is not severe)
What to thyself thou wishest to be done;
Forgiv thy foes, and love thy parents dear,
And friends and nativ land, nor these alone,
All human weal and woe learn then to make thine own. —Beattie.

IN Christian churches it is currently taught that God may justly do what in man would be monstrous cruelty. God is believed to spend eternity in burning alive those of his children who hav disobeyed him, or who hav only not aceepted his conditions of salvation, or in subjecting them to tortures of which burning alive would be a faint symbol. But the same act would not for a moment be justified or be judged as other than monstrous cruelty in man.—Samuel Longfellow.

CHRISTMAS itself is a day surrounded with curious ceremonies of pagan origin, and in no way serving to fix the 25th of December as the natal day. Yet the exact period at which Almighty God, as a baby boy, entered the world to redeem long-suffering humanity from the consequences of Adam's ancient sin should be of some importance. —Charles Bradlaugh.

IT does not appear that there was any uniformity in the period of observing the nativity of Jesus Christ among the early churches Some held the festival in the month of May or April, others in January. It is, nevertheless, almost certain that the 25th of December cannot be the nativity of the savior, for it is then the hight of the rainy season in Judea, and shepherds could hardly be watching their flocks by night in the plains.—Chamber's Encyclopedia.

IF any man is able to convince me and show me that I do not act or think right, I will gladly change, for I seek the truth, by which no man was ever injured. But he is injured who abides in his error and ignorance.—M. A. Antoninus.

THE historian Lecky cites a touching story of an old monk who considered God as altogether human, and whom he was wont to address in most familiar language. When he was convinced by a brother monk that he was altogether wrong in holding said anthropomorphic views of the deity, he clasped his hands in agony and said, while the tears ran down his cheeks, "You hav taken away my God! You hav taken away my God!"—J. L. Stoddard.

To make this earth a world of peace and love we must each and all put a few softening, brightening gleams on it by living out daily and hourly good and humanizing acts, and speaking kind, cheering, and gentle words, and thinking pure, happy, and hopeful thoughts. If each one does his share toward cleansing the little world of which he is the center from all ideas of revenge, punishment, hate, and malignity, and all unnecessary sufferings in man or beast, the spirit of universal happiness, light, and love will shine with such a fair, illuminating effulgence of exquisit glory as has never yet been conceived of. Work, then, in hope, work patiently, and the good will surely come, for all things evolute gradually but surely toward perfection.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

THE greatest organ in the world—the organ of speech in woman; an organ, too, without a stop.

THE Chicago Times says that Boston is 250 years old, and this explains why her women wear spectacles.

"2TH piks" on a vase in a boarding-house reminds us that the landlord has adopted the reform spelling.

AN Irishman on seeing a very small coffin exclaimed, "Is it possible that coffin was intinded for any livin' crayture?"

SHE was plump and beautiful, and he was wildly fond of her. She hated him, but woman-like, she strove to catch him. He was a flea.

THE age of economy has been reached in Foxboro, Mass., where a woman stopped a clock from running because it would wear out too fast.

YOUNG lady, gazing on her portrait just finished by a rising young artist, remarked, "I look like a canvas-backed duck." He felt like eating her.

THE average age of a hog is only fifteen years. This always consoles us when we see a man spreading himself out over four seats in a railway car.

AN Irishman watching a game of baseball was sent to grass by a foul which struck him under the fifth rib. "A fowl, wus ut? Begorra I thought it was a mule!"

YOUNG smarty, who is way below his teens, noticing a great number of shooting stars the other evening, coolly states that "God's practicing with his breech-loader."

SHE had sued for breach of promis, and the verdict of the jury was against her. "Want to poll the jury?" she was asked. "Yes, I do. Jes' gimme the pole for two minutes."

UNDER the laws of Illinois, what a person sees through a keyhole cannot be accepted as evidence in court; but no sewing society in the country would reject such testimony.

A CASE of domestic scandal was under discussion at a tea-table. "Well, let us think the best of her we can," said an elderly spinster. "Yes," said another, "and say the worst—that's the fashion."

"DOES the conversation and carriage of your new minister become the gospel?" asked a learned bishop of a simple-minded farmer. "Well," was the reply, "his conversation is rather fluid, and he don't keep a carriage."

AN Iowa man has been arrested for assaulting his own wife, and he was found guilty, even though it was shown that he only stuffed her mouth with putty when he wanted to go to sleep. Do men hav no rights at all?

"MY dear, what makes you always yawn?"
The wife exclaimed, her temper gone.
"Is home so dull and dreary?"
"Not so, my love," he said; "not so;
But man and wife are one, you know,
And when alone I'm weary."

WHY HE WISHED TO SEE HER.

The other night Bickels went home and found his wife particularly retrospectiv. She talked of the past with a tear, and looked to the future with a sigh.

"Oh, by the way," said Bickels, as he sat on the side of the bed pulling off his boots, "I saw a gentleman down town to-day who would giv a thousand dollars to see you."

"Who was he? Does he liv in Little Rock?"

"I don't know his name."

"I'll warrant that it was Oliver Gregg."

"No."

"Then it must be George Weatherton."

"Guess again. I might know his name if I were to hear it."

"Oh, I do wish I knew!" said the lady exhibiting excitement. "Was it Oscar Peoples?"

"Guess again. I remember his name now."

"Harvey Glenkins?"

"No. His name is Lucas Wentwing."

"I don't know a man by that name. Why would he giv a thousand dollars to see me?"

"Because he's blind."

THE GOAT.

The goat is a nativ of the vacant lots about the city, and there are lots of them.

The goat is omnivorous. He will goat anything he sees, and will seize anything that he may goat.

The gentleman goat is called Billy, but he is a Billy that no policeman can handle.

The lady goats are Nanny. This is the ewe-Nanny-mous name.

The young goat is called a kid. Kids are on hand the year round.

The goat is generous to a fault. He presents a couple of horns to everybody he sees.

In the matter of mere cash the Cashmere goat is the most famous.

Goats are fond of the outskirts of large cities, also hoop-skirts.

The goat wears a beard. It is called a goatee, though not confined to the he goat.

The goat is noted for his bunting, but never flags.

The goat is one of the signs of the zodiac, signifying that he has a propensity for knocking things sky-high.

He never gets high himself. That is to say, he never gets over the ba-a-a-a.

Shakspere understood the spontaneity of the goat when he said, "Stand not upon the order of your going, but goat once."

The goat is a wide-awake animal. He is never caught napping, notwithstanding the many cases of kid-napping you may hav read about.

For many years the goat was the only butter known.

Goats love to get on a high rock and sun themselvs. Giv them a chance and they will always seek a sunny climb.

The god Pan was a sort of half goat. All goats do not pan out as well as he did.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Vol. 8. No. 30. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, July 23, 1881. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. R. Rock, a United Brethren pastor at Canton, O., has been suspended for saying, "D——n it."

Do clergymen commonly fish on Sunday while on their summer vacations? A minister's wife says so in letter to the Congregationalist.

DELIA POIRIER, a religious monomaniac, has just murdered her cell-mate, Gertrude Roberts, in the Longue Point Asylum, Canada, mistaking her for a frightful dragon.

IT is said in the Belfast Witness that "in some of the congregations of the Irish Presbyterian church the rite of public baptism has not been administered for a generation."

THE Rev. Mr. Vetterling, a Detroit pastor, got drunk on an excursion steamer, was caught kissing a girl, got a violent blow from another whom he tried to kiss, and was finally arrested.

THE men of Nebraska will vote next year on a constitutional amendment allowing women to vote, and a systematic agitation of the woman suffrage question has already been commenced there.

IN Rocklin, Cal., the Congregational church has for two years been without a pastor. There is no rush of applicants for the vacant pulpit, as the church has only five members. The vacancy will probably continue for some time to come.

THE Holy Man of Senoussi, in Tripoli, who is only awaiting his fortieth birthday—which will be next year—to reveal himself as the "Mchedi," or reformer of the Mohammedans, destined to drive the Christians from northern Africa, is visited by thousands of pilgrims.

HERE is an instance where a counterfeit was as good as a genuin: A lady who occupied a cottage at Mount Desert last summer had a box made for her jewelry in imitation of a Bible. While absent one day some one entered her home and carried off her silverware, but her box of jewelry was undisturbed.

IT looks as though another division among the already much-divided Lutherans cannot be long avoided. The doctrin on which the Lutheran Synodical Conference is splitting is predestination, one part of the church holding to and the other rejecting the belief that God foreordains some men to be lost and some to be saved.

THE rector of an infant church in South Carolina, whose roll of members numbers exactly eight, finds much comfort in the fact that just the same number of persons were in Noah's ark. When he shall hav a revival increasing the force by fifty per cent, he will probably be thankful that the number equals that of the original apostles.

A WOMAN belonging to the sect called Perfectionists undertook to run herself to death at Dallas, Texas. She got the idea from a scriptural passage about "running the race to the end" that if she ran till she died she would go direct to heaven. She could not kill herself by pedestrianism, however, and resorted to drowning instead.

D. M. BENNETT, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York, is going on a journey around the world, and scores of persons are sending to him $5 in advance for the book he is to write, telling what he sees. Mr. Bennett is a true, brave man, who deserves rest and recreation, and we send him $5 for his book, hoping that the money will help to bring him safely home, all in good time.—Great West.

SOME of the criticisms made on the "King James" version of the Bible when it was issued were quite as scathing as some of those which hav been made on the "revised." One very severe clergyman said in 1611 that he would rather be torn in pieces by wild horses than impose such a version on the poor churches of England. Within fifty years the "King James" version was accepted and used wherever the English language was spoken.

IT is stated in some of the papers that the daughter of Victoria Woodhull is about to be joined in marriage with Lord Colin Campbell, fifth son of the Duke of Argyll, a prominent scion of the nobility of England. But other papers deny this interesting statement and declare that the lady whom the young lord is about to marry is a daughter of Ireland, and having not the remotest relationship with Mrs. Woodhull. Thus this pretty fiction, like many others, is knocked in the head

THE London Pall Mall Gazette of July 15th warns Mr. Bradlaugh that his notice to the speaker of the House of Commons, declaring that he will present himself at the table, demanding to be allowed to take the Parliamentary oath, and resist physical force, if offered, is a menace of lawlessness, and that he and his followers should understand that those who, like the Pall Mall Gazette, hav supported and intend to support his lawful claims through thick and thin, can see nothing but mischief and failure in it.

SOME ambitious faster may yet beat Griscom's record of forty-five days without food, but we don't believe that any one can beat Griscom. Dr. Tanner at the close of his fast was very much prostrated; but Griscom, after forty-five days' fasting, apparently was not suffering for want of food, and seemed able to go on indefinitly. In fact, it looked as though he would hav fasted until he died, and by doing so he might hav conferred a much greater benefit on science than he has now done. Then we would hav known exactly how long a man can liv on nothing. Now we still hav to guess at it.

THE Baptist Foreign Mission Board is in a peck of trouble about the views of two young brethren who hav been commissioned as missionaries to China. These are South Carolina men, named Stout and Bell. In their theological training they had imbibed certain views on the inspiration of the Bible, much the same as those held by Prof. C. H. Toy, and for the holding of which that eminent scholar was obliged to leave the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary. These views are not radically diverse from those held by other Christians; in fact, not nearly as much so as those advanced by Prof. Robertson Smith, of Scotland.

AN Illinois woman was unwilling, on marrying a second time, to giv up the alimony which she had been receiving from her first husband, from whom she had been divorced. She brought a suit to compel the continuance of payments, but the Supreme Court decided against her. "Treating alimony," said Judge Scott, "as the equivalent of that obligation for support which arises in favor of the wife out of the marriage contract, and which is lost when that contract is annulled by the decree, she obtains the same obligation for support by a second marriage. It is unreasonable that she should hav the equivalent of an obligation for support by way of alimony from a former husband and an obligation from a present husband for an adequate support at the same time."

BRO. INSKIP has returned from his evangelistic journey around the world. The brethren at Ocean Grove gave him a cordial greeting. Of his labors in Australia he reports that he traveled eight hundred miles in eight weeks, and preached eighty sermons. These sermons, he says, resulted in the saving of about twenty-five hundred people, "about two-thirds of whom were converted, and the balance wholly sanctified." The distinction between "converted" and "wholly sanctified" is one which is exceedingly difficult for anybody outside of Bro. Inskip's circle of "holiness people" to draw. It may be said, however, in a general way, that the "converted" ones are about as good as ordinary Christians in other folds of Christian faith. The "wholly sanctified" believe themselvs to be so much better than ordinary mortals that they are above the temptation and power of sin, and liv without doing any evil. A leading religious paper intimates that if Bro. Inskip could with his eighty sermons accomplish such results among the sinful Australians, it is a pity he should not try his power in this city; for there are many here, notably in Wall street and other financial localities, who might be considerably better than they are if they were only "wholly sanctified."

DR. THOMAS D. SPENCER argues, in the Popular Science Monthly, that in most cases death is painless. "It is a physiological process," he says, "and ought to be free from suffering. When the flat of death went forth, Nature kindly provided an anesthetic for the body. As the end of life draws near, the respirations become slow and shallow, interrupted now and then by a deep, sighing inspiration, as though the lungs were vainly endeavoring to throw off the palsy creeping over them. As the intervals between the inspirations grow longer, the blood becomes saturated with carbonic acid gas—the same as that formed from burning charcoal, whose deadly fumes have so often aided the suicide painlessly to destroy life." Dying is therefore very much like gently falling asleep.

COL. INGERSOLL expressed himself on prayer, etc., to a reporter of the Cincinnati Enquirer as follows: "I think now that the President will liv. I think so because he has lived so long, and every hour he keeps alive givs assurance of more. I hav not seen him since the first day, but I hav talked with all the doctors in the case, some of them several times, and with the people of the White House, and what they tell me has even been more encouraging than what is put in the bulletins. I do not think that the liver is touched at all, or at least only the tip end of it. There may be trouble to-morrow, as it is his sixth day, and I am told that the third, sixth, and ninth days are critical ones. But what assures me," said the jolly Colonel, with a quiet laugh, "is the fact that many people regard this as a test of Tyndall's prayer-gage. Here we hav fifty millions of people, more or less, in this country, with enough beyond seas to make up the less, all of these praying with might and main for the recovery of Gen. Garfield. Now, if he gets well they will claim it as a victory. Now, it strikes me that if God was going to play any part in this affair he would hav taken a hand earlier. God must hav known all along when he was allowing Guiteau to spend his time in beating hotel keepers, etc., that he was to shoot a president in 1881. If God had interfered when Guiteau bought the pistol, and had allowed it to hav shot himself as a victim, all would hav been well. That would hav been sensible. And, as George Elliot said, 'when God does his best work he needs the best men to help him.' I hav no objection to the whole nation praying for General Garfield, because I think it will do him no harm; but I would object very much if instead of a staff of four good doctors they should put a praying band about him. Then I would become alarmed. So long as the doctors and the patient do not rely on prayer I hav no fear. Prayer is a good thing for the one who prays, if he or she may like it; but it is of very little moment to the thing prayed for or the object being prayed to. I would believe there was some efficacy in prayer if a universal invocation should be sent up for the bullet to drop out, and it did so; and if God cannot put President Garfield on his feet at five minutes' notice he is no great shakes of a God after all—about as much good, I should say, as a last year's mullen-stalk. If I were sick I should much rather hav a good doctor than any amount of prayer, not that I would want people to pray against me, for I would not want to hav people's bad opinion. No man desires to see General Garfield fill his term out more than I; but I rely on the doctors now, and General Garfield himself, to bring about that result."

NEW ULM, Minn., was visited by a terrible cyclone last week. Over one hundred buildings were demolished, and upwards of thirty persons killed or wounded. The loss of property is estimated at over $500,000, none of which was insured against accidents of this kind.

THE Fiji Times of April 30th has an account of the massacre at Tipitawa, one of the Tino Islands, of over one thousand men, women, and children by a lot of Christian proselytes, led in person by the missionary who converted them, and who is under arrest at Honolulu to answer for the crime.

A BOOKKEEPER employed by J. Ruppert, the brewer, was robbed of $9,600 which he was taking to the bank. He was driving down Lexington avenue, when the robbers rode up behind him, jumped into his carriage, knocked him down, grabbed the cash, and then made off, cutting his horse's reins to prevent pursuit, and hav not yet been captured.

Translations.

Alamontada, the Galley-Slave.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF JOHANN HEINRICH DANIEL ZSCHOKKE, BY IRA G. MOSHER, LL.B.

CHAPTER XV.

So far the good Abbé Dillon read. Midnight had overtaken us. But neither of us was tired. We were silent. Tears trembled in our eyes. I threw myself on Dillon's breast. Roderick embraced him also. We so held him, speechless, for a long time to our beating hearts. It seemed to us as if we were pressing the noble Alamontada himself to our breasts; as if our thanks were not given to the abbé; no, as if they were given to him.

"And so I also once sank on to his heart," said Dillon. "'O man!' cried I, deeply moved, "'how was it possible that humanity cast thee out of their midst? How couldst thou with this lofty spirit become a criminal? Since when is the virtuous forged to the galley-bench? Wast thou, perhaps, so great a sinner that human society had to be afraid of thee? This is not possible, Alamontada! Thou hast been innocently condemned to the most cruel punishment. Oh, so speak! I undertake thy justification. Thou shalt, thou must once more return honored into the ranks of humanity. Disgrace shall not rest upon thy grave!'

"He was very deeply moved. He pressed me with emotion to himself, and his eyes melted in tears. 'Oh!' cried he, 'yet once more a man, a brother on this long-ago forsaken poor heart! Ah! it has in these nine-and-twenty years of its loneliness not yet forgotten how to love; it feels once more its old happiness before it breaks!' In his sadness he could speak no more. He silently wept.

"After a long pause he raised his face to me and said: 'O sir, dear sir, how hav I deserved so much kindness and love?'

"'Could I prolong thy life, dear man,' I exclaimed, 'willingly I would sacrifice my own for that! But thou knowest not that thou art my benefactor, my guardian angel. Thou knowest not that thou hast lifted me out of the abysses of doubt. I was sent to thee to lead thee back to religion, O Alamontada! and thou it wast who led me back and gave me the lost religion.'

"He did not seem to understand me. 'Behold, Alamontada, I was an unfortunate being when I came to thee. I had lost God out of my world, and stared trembling into the future, as into a lifeless darkness. Doubts over all, over my having and being, enveloped me. I staggered about between contradictions, and became with my nonsense a burden and a disgust to myself. Thou, friend, hast raised me up again, and hast shown me to myself in my true nature and dignity. God, immortality, and independence of myself—they are! My spirit cannot deny itself. Through thee I am again in harmony withna ture; before me, lying on the scales of eternal reason, the worthiness and unworthiness of things are weighed. Darkness clears up again, and that which was desolate blossoms with young life! and all that was given me by thyself!'

"In this beautiful hour it was that Alamontada's heart opened itself to me. He gave me, in torn leaves, his diary. He made me, at my urgent request, acquainted with many events of his life. I need not now say, Alamontada was innocent! I would at once begin to work at his justification. I wanted that justice should giv him public satisfaction—giv back to him the honor of which it had robbed him. He shook his head, and begged me, so long as he lived, to take no step toward that end. He was not desirous of the esteem of a world which had cast him out so long, so mercilessly, and preferred his last days to belong undivided and undisturbed to himself.

"I at once procured for him, from the authorities, a better room and greater comforts. With pleasure I would hav sacrificed all I possessed to prepare for him a joyful moment after so many endured sufferings. Alas! that I became acquainted with him so late!

"Upon my repeated request to communicate to me all his wishes, even the most secret ones, he finally said: 'Well, write to Nismes or Montpellier, to find out what has become of Clementine—if she still livs; whether she has married; whether she has been happy.'

"I knew this Clementine from his papers and his oral communications. 'And how, Alamontada,' said I, 'if now Clementine still livs? Wouldst thou not want to see her once more?'

"He smiled quietly to himself at this question. 'Ah! she was the angel who magically beautified my youth, and weeping accompanied me to the threshold of my lost Eden. No, do not trouble yourself, my dear sir. She will no more think of Alamontada, if she livs, and much less will she care to make a journey to the dying-bed of a galley-slave.'

"I wrote. I summoned the aid of all my friends, of all my acquaintances, to discover Clementine and to induce her to hasten without delay to Toulon, where important news awaited her. Finally I succeeded by one of my friends to find out her abode. It was in Montpellier, whither she had returned from Paris a few years before. She hardly had learned about Alamontada when she concluded to undertake the journey to Toulon, notwithstanding her lying sick with a severe disease.

"Yet, beloved," continued Dillon, "we forget that midnight has past, that we need rest. To-morrow, if you desire, I will relate to you the story of our mutual friend. It is instructiv. Only a man like Alamontada could bear so cruel a fate without perishing under it. With his eye upon God, elevated above his own pain, he walked heroically through a terrible life, of which each hour was more horrible than death."

At these words Dillon arose. We followed his invitation. We embraced him with heart felt thanks. "What you, dear abbé, once said to the venerable slave, when you thanked him for your conversion, you hav spoken also in our names!" exclaimed I. "What a majestic being this Alamontada in his chains! What a mighty, rare spirit! His words sound like oracles, and make man more divine. I will copy his speeches. They are only fragments, but in themselvs complete. One must read them oftener, hear them oftener, in order to enter fully into the beautiful tabernacle of their meaning."

"And I erect to his memory an altar in my garden," cried Roderick, "the sight of which will always strengthen me. If I falter, I shall think of Alamontada, and my untrained, feeble spirit will lift itself up in the memory of him and be strong!"

So we separated, filled with enthusiasm. The dawn of morning found us sooner than sleep.

[From Parton's Life of Voltaire.]

The Storm of Monosyllables.

A certain Father Berthier, the plodding, indefatigable editor of a "religious weekly" of Paris, called the Journal de Trévoux, the organ of the Jesuits, was the first to draw his fire.

Voltaire had retained a kindly feeling for the Jesuits, by whom he had been educated; and members of the order were still among his friendly correspondents. For some time past, however, the Journal de Trévoux had pursued with fresh zeal the vocation of the religious newspaper, which was and is to convey the truths it hates to minds most in need of them. In other words, this journal had assailed with weak and blundering severity the Encyclopedia, Voltaire's "Essai sur les Mœurs," his poem upon natural religion, and other works of humanizing tendency. But to denounce those works it was necessary to name, describe, and quote them, and thus to spread abroad some knowledge of their contents among the class which the works themselvs would not otherwise hav reached.

Ecrasez l' Infâme! On a day in December, 1759, appeared in Paris an anonymous pamphlet of thirty pages, entitled "Narrativ of the Sickness, Confession, Death, and Reappearance of the Jesuit Berthier." No adequate idea can be given here of the comic richness of this burlesque, of which every sentence is a hit. The fun reaches its climax when a rival editor, a priest of a rival order, is hastily summoned to confess the dying Jesuit. It is known how tenderly the editors of rival periodicals of this kind loved one another in the last century. These two priests, who had contended for many years with pen and scissors, were unknown to each other personally, and the confession had proceeded far before either discovered who the other was. Poor Berthier at length finds himself in purgatory, doomed to remain 333,333 years, 3 months, 3 weeks, and 3 days; and then only to be delivered when some brother of his order could be found who should be humble, peaceable, and without desire to go to court, who should not calumniate any one to princes, not mingle in worldly affairs, make no one yawn with his writings, and, finally, be willing to apply to Father Berthier all his merits. "What is your penance in purgatory?" The reply was, "I am obliged to make every morning the chocolate of a Jansenist, to read aloud at dinner time a Provincial Letter, and to employ myself the rest of the time in mending the chemises of the nuns of Port Royal." Every phase is an allusion, half lost upon us at this distance of time, but not lost upon the susceptible Parisians of 1759.

Before this burlesque tale had spent its force, another pamphlet, by the same anonymous and well-known hand, pervaded the city, entitled "Narrativ of the Journey of Brother Garassise, Nephew of Brother Garasse, Successor to Father Berthier, and what followed, in Anticipation of what is to follow." This relates the election of Father Berthier's successor. Fréron is a candidate. A learned brother objects in terms like these, "My friend, you hav, it is true, great qualities; but it is said in Cicero, 'Cast not the children's bread to the dogs.'" The place is given finally to Brother Garassise, who claims to possess the pen of Berthier, the insipidity of Catron, the antitheses of Porée, and the dryness of Daniel. He was the man to succeed the wearisome Berthier, who, however, continued for many years to bestow his tediousness upon his countrymen. But no reader of these two pamphlets could ever again hav heard or seen his name without a smile. The ingenuity of the author is shown in the manner in which he conveys at every moment an impression of the childish ignorance of the ecclesiastical mind and the triviality of ecclesiastical topics.

The Jesuits attempted a retaliation in kind. There was published in 1761, at Geneva and Paris, a pamphlet entitled "Narrativ of the Sickness, Confession, and End of M. de Voltaire, and what followed, by Me, Jos. Dubois." La Harpe deemed this piece not altogether unsuccessful, but Voltaire pronounced it a "flat imitation" of his burlesque. He was preparing to pursue Berthier further, when more important game drew his attention. The next affair amused the reading people of Europe for many months, and averted from France a truly portentious evil.

A new royal family was growing up then in France. That ill-starred prince, who was one day to reign and perish as Louis XVI., was in 1760 a heavy, tractable boy, six years old, and he was the Dauphin's third son. The royal boys were at an age when a tutor was usually appointed; and the office of tutor had twice, within living memory, led to positions of overmastering influence. De Fleury, prime minister for nearly a generation, had been tutor to Louis XV.; Boyer, Anc. Bishop of Mirepoix, had been tutor to his only son, the present Dauphin. The question, therefore, who should be again put on this directest road to the summits of power was big with interest to society and to patriotism. A candidate appeared in the spring of 1760, a country magistrate, Le Franc, Marquis of Pompignan, a minor poet of some merit, author of many psalms and other verse, some of which were more than respectable. His strength lay in the fact that he was the last author of any recognized rank that was left on the orthodox side. In his youth he had coquetted with Deism, and had even translated into French verse Pope's "Universal Prayer;" but his later psalms had made amends, and he now stood forth a champion of the faith. He had a younger brother, the bishop of Puy, a not illiberal ecclesiastic, a zealous and industrious defender of the church.

These two men hung over France in 1760 as its probable masters, the Dauphin being precisely the man to be governed by such a pair; for he had an inkling of esprit, and a solid preponderance of unquestioning faith. The marquis, recently enriched by marriage, the oracle of his nativ remote Montauban, a man of inordinate vanity, came to Paris in the early days of 1760 on an errand of deepest interest to him. He had been elected to the seat in the French Academy last filled by Maupertius; in March he was publicly received, when he delivered the usual speech commemorativ of his predecessor. In this oration, he made what was felt to be a bid for the tutorship of the Dauphin's children, by attacking, almost by name, several of his most distinguished colleagues. He violated the sanctity of a place which all parties had hitherto cherished as an asylum of peace and good-temper amid embittered controversies. In the course of his harang, he fell upon the age itself as vaunting its superior light, while producing little but false science and shameful literature.

"What do we behold?" asked the speaker. "Here, an immense succession of scandalous libels, insolent verses, writings frivolous or licentious; there, in the class of philosophers, is seen a long display of rash opinions, systems openly impious, or direct insinuations against religion; elsewhere, the historian presents to us facts malignly disguised, satiric darts aimed at things the most holy, and against the soundest maxims of government. All, in a word, that these numberless books contain, bears the imprint of a depraved literature, corrupt morals, and an arrogant philosophy, which saps equally the throne and the altar."

The orator resumed his seat, after three-quarters of an hour of this, amid applause that seemed general because it was loud; for this style of remark was then the short way to court favor; it was the fashionable hue and cry of the moment. The chairman of the session complimented the new member warmly, and ventured to bring the orator's brother, the Bishop of Puy, into view, in a manner that is not forgotten in France to this day. He compared the magistrate to Moses, and the bishop to Aaron! "Everything retraces in you," said the chairman, "the image of those two brothers who were consecrated, the one to be judge of Israel, and the other as pontiff to work miracles in Israel." It was safe to stand well with these brothers; for who could say how soon they might be astride of France? Le Franc enjoyed a day of cloudless triumph, which many men hav since enjoyed by similar means. He was admitted to the king's presence, to present in person a copy of his discourse. "I promis you that I will read it," said the king; and he kept his word. The same day, the king asked one of his court what he thought of it. "I found it a little long, sire," was the reply. "True," said the king. "I was twenty minutes reading it, and it must hav been longer at the Academy; but, in my opinion, it is an excellent work, and not at all likely to be applauded by the impious and headstrong."

This king, as the reader remembers, was then in the Deer Park period of his history. In the interregnum of mistresses, between Pompadour and Dubarry, young girls of fourteen and thirteen were bought for him; and so pious was this father of his people that he insisted on their saying their prayers at night, and set them an edifying example by kneeling beside them. He was so pious that when the host went by he would get out of his carriage, and kneel to it in the mud, to the transport of some spectators.

Le Franc de Pompignan was well pleased with his day's work at the Academy. His discourse was promptly forwarded to Ferney. It was Le Franc who then held Voltaire's former post of historiographer of France; a circumstance that gave point to the new member's reflections upon historical literature. A few days after, a duodecimo pamphlet of seven pages, dateless, anonymous, without name of publisher or place, snowed down upon Paris, and was seen everywhere at once. The following is a translation of it:—[We are obliged to omit the larger part of the paper, but giv enough to show its character.—ED. T. S.]

"THE WHENS:

"BEING USEFUL NOTES UPON A DISCOURSE PRONOUNCED BEFORE THE FRENCH ACADEMY, MARCH 10, 1760.

"WHEN one has the honor to be received into an honorable society of men of letters, it is not necessary that his reception speech should be a satire against men of letters; it is to insult the society and the public.

"WHEN, by chance, one is rich, it is not necessary to hav the base cruelty to reproach men of letters with their poverty in an academical discourse, and to say, with pride, that they declaim against riches, and that they in secret envy the rich: (1) because the new member cannot know what his less opulent colleagues secretly think; (2) because none of them envy the new member.

"WHEN one does not honor his age by his works, it is a strange temerity in him to decry his age.

"WHEN one is scarcely a man of letters at all, and not in the least a philosopher, it does not become him to say that our nation has only a false literature and a vain philosophy.

"WHEN one addresses an academy in France, it is not becoming to get into a fury against the philosophers which England has produced; it is necessary rather to study them.

"WHEN one is admitted into a respectable body, he ought, in his address, to conceal under the veil of modesty the insolent pride which characterizes hot-heads and mediocre talents."

This moderate and just rebuke had instantaneous success with the public. The repetition of the when was a kind of device that easily "brings down the house," whether in or out of the theater. Several diarists note the immediate interest which the little pamphlet excited in all circles. The Abbé Morellet, then in the flower of his age, a recent acquisition to the philosophic band, followed up the stroke with his "Ifs," and, soon after, with his "Wherefores"—deeming it just, as he remarks, to make Le Franc run the gauntlet of the particles. Both of these pamphlets hitting the humor of the public, the abbé followed them with a reproduction of Le Franc's forgotten translation of Pope's "Universal Prayer," to which he appended notes and comments. Voltaire then took another turn with a song, in four stanzas, entitled "The Tos," which he followed with "The Thats," "The Whos," "The Whys," "The Yeses," and "The Noes." An epigram flew from hand to hand: "Do you know why Jeremiah wept so much during his life-time? It was because he foresaw, prophet-like, that one day he would be translated by Le Franc." Other hands contributed, and not a week passed without some new jest in prose or verse escaping into print, aimed at the luckless Academician. Voltaire unearthed Le Franc's early tragedy, "Dido," of which he published some ludicrous morsels, with such commentary as he knew how to giv. He told Marmontel that his physician had ordered him to hunt Pompignan for an hour or two every morning, for the benefit of his health. The poor man could not show himself anywhere without exciting merriment.

He seemed buried, as Madame du Deffand said, under "mountains of ridicule," and well deserved to be, she thought; for he was not a simpleton merely, but hypocritical and malign. But he was not so easily killed, still less buried. Much is allowed to a man who takes the king's side. He increased the general mirth by the wonderfully absurd way in which he defended himself. In reply to Morellet, he published a serious and minute narrativ to show that his translation of the "Universal Prayer" was merely an exercise in English, published without his knowledge, and executed twenty-two years before. Exasperated by the relentless hail of sharp particles, he carried his absurdity to the point of addressing a remonstrance on the subject to the king and queen, which drew upon him still more stinging derision. "The whole court," said he, "was witness of the reception which their majesties accorded me. It is necessary that the universe should know, also, that their majesties appeared to occupy themselvs with my work, not as a passing or unimportant novelty, but as a production which was not unworthy of the particular attention of the sovereigns."

Nothing, it would seem, could highten the ridicule of this performance; but Voltaire pounced upon it, and prolonged the merriment with which it was received even to the present day. A little piece was issued from what Baron Grimm styled the manufactory at Ferney, purporting to be an extract from the newspaper of Le Franc's city of Montauban, which represented his townsmen as alarmed for his sanity, and sending a committee to Paris to ascertain the truth. The committee found him raving mad, uttering snatches of crazy verse (selected from his own works), while he foamed at the mouth and gritted his teeth. The messengers burst into tears, and returned to Montauban to report the melancholy tidings. But this was a trifle compared with a poem from the same source, called "La Vanité," a work of great satiric force, in Voltaire's peculiar style of serious and weighty badinage.

Poor Pompignan fled before the storm to his nativ city; where, however, he retained a certain hold upon the court from the very violence of this attack. He was by no means yet destroyed as a candidate for court favor, and we shall see the king seizing opportunities to distinguish him.

Communications.

More Slanders of Paine.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I do not mean to trouble you too often with my communications, and should not do so now were it not for the fact that in reading a magazine entitled Leisure Hours, I came across an article under the following title, "Who was Thomas Paine?" In the course of this article were many most palpable falsities concerning that much-abused and persecuted man, who yet stood far ahead of his maligners in every respect. I will make a few quotations from this article that your readers may see what a tissue of falsehoods it contains. The writer of this article commences by noticing the birth of Mr. Paine in 1737. Directly we find the following: "He married the daughter of a custom house officer who was born in Paine's own nativ place. Three years had they been married when Mrs. Paine applied to the magistrates for permission to separate from her husband. An act of separation was allowed her on account of the cruel treatment which she had received from him. Mark this, my worthy female readers. So fared the wife of the author of 'The Rights of Man!'"

Now, in the various biographical sketches of Thomas Paine, I hav never seen the most distant allusion to anything like the foregoing. I believe it is all made out of whole cloth. I believe it to be untrue from beginning to end. I believe it to be a fair sample of all the lies which the disciples of the church hav put in circulation regarding Thomas Paine.

A little farther on this immaculate (?) and truthful (?) writer again says: "Shortly after this it was discovered that Paine had been bribed by some smugglers, and had connived at their landing contraband goods. In order to escape the punishment which now threatened him he fled to America, where the Revolutionary war had just began." This precious statement will be news to most people, especially the baseless statement in regard to his fleeing to America "to escape punishment." The idea of a man like Thomas Paine, who was an intimate friend of Benjamin Franklin, George Franklin, and Thomas Jefferson being implicated in such a transaction as the foregoing! It is, on the face of it, a most transparent falsehood.

Next, this delightful writer of orthodox lies refers to Mr. Paine in France, and presently breaks out in a new strain after the following fashion: "Thomas Jefferson, who was President of the United States in 1801, sent an American ship of war to deliver Paine from the perils which were continually thickening around him in France. In the spring of 1802 he landed in New York. The next day after landing he left for the city of Washington, where he was received with open arms by the Infidels from all parts of the United States. A public dinner was announced in honor of the author of 'The Age of Reason' and the defamer of the fair name of Washington."

I wonder where this writer got hold of the idea that Thomas Paine ever defamed George Washington? Why, what an abominable falsehood is this!

But let us go on a little further in this scurrilous article and see what else the author introduces. He writes again, "It was expected, now, that 'reason' would unfold her richest treasures, and that an exuberance of wit and sarcasm would gush forth."

How venomously sarcastic is this language! It betrays most unmistakably the feelings, the animus, which prompted this falsifier and defamer. Again he writes: "Paine entered the assembly in dirty boots, with his trowsers torn, his waistcoat smeared with a thick layer of brown snuff, and his coat out at each elbow, at which point a shirt that did not seem to hav been washed for months peeped out."

All this is disgustingly false and worthy of the sternest reprobation. But just read what follows: "He reeled backward and forward, deeply drunk, and void of all his wits."

Then this vilifier goes on to say that he would not be received at any of the various hotels in New York city, to which city he afterward returned. This gentlemanly and Christian writer thus remarks: "His baggage was now carried from one hotel to another, and from coffee-house to coffee-house; but everywhere the same greeting saluted him, 'We hav no room.'"

I believe just as much of this as of anything else from the pen of this nefarious writer, and that is nothing whatever. Not content with abusing, misrepresenting, and traducing Thomas Paine, this writer drags in the names of other Freethinkers, William Carver (with whom Mr. Paine had resided), W. Morton, and another Freethinker, whose initials only were given. So this orthodox defamer goes on. If I had space, and had not already written quite enough of the false, abusiv, disgusting attacks on the patriotic, honest, and upright Thomas Paine, I could add much more to what I hav already noted down. But I am sure I hav written quite enough to expose the animating, controling, and actuating principle which impelled this notorious falsifier to vomit forth his venom. I want your readers to peruse these statements.

Yours, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

Letter from Col. John R. Kelso.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On the 6th inst. I left Virginia City on my return to Reno. While upon this journey I perceived that I had erred in my last letter in regard to some of the tunnels, which I incorrectly placed between Reno and Washoe. They are all nearer Virginia City.

Upon reaching Reno I found that some of the parties upon whom I had depended to engage a hall for me, etc., had been called away, and that the only suitable hall in the place, the Nevada theater, was engaged to other parties; I concluded therefore to come on to this place, Idaho Springs, Colorado, where I am to lecture on the 23d, 24th, 25th, and 26th of the present month.

Leaving Reno, we pass down the Truckee river, the valley of which is narrow and unimportant. Almost all the level lands and portions of the mountains are covered with the dull-looking sage and grease-wood, with the monotonous view of which we soon became extremely weary. Indeed, the whole scene, as far as the eye can reach in all directions, becomes one of indescribable grandeur and desolation. All around us in the distance, and sometimes near at hand, lofty mountains rear their snow-capped summits to the clouds, and stand, as they hav stood for unknown ages, the vast, silent sentinels of this strange and dreary region. But little animal life is visible, and, in my opinion, there is but little hope that this portion of our country will ever be able to support a settled and civilized population. Its want of water is its irrevocable doom. A few Indians are found almost everywhere. These are more filthy, miserable, and disgusting than are the coyotes and the ground-owls that inhabit the same cheerless region.

About noon we are in full view of the Humboldt Lake, which lies to our right, and which is about thirty-five miles in length and ten miles in width. Its waters seem to be dirty and shallow, and yet a view of them refreshes the eye after so long a contemplation of the desolate scenes through which we hav been passing. Here we see cattle in considerable numbers, and water-fowl.

After leaving Ogden we pass through Weber and Echo Canyons, which rank high among the wonderful scenes of earth. How I would like to describe all that we behold here! To do so, however, would require a volume. I will simply say, therefore, as I said when I first looked upon that grandest scene of earth—Yosemite—had I missed this view my life would never hav been complete.

After leaving behind us the almost inconceivably grand scenes of these canyons, we pass out into a comparativly open country, covered, however, still with the ever-enduring and hateful sage. The same general aspect prevails till we reach Green River in Wyoming. Here we begin to meet with scenes of beauty, good lands, lively villages, etc. At Sherman we stop an hour and breathe the pure, thin atmosphere at a hight of 8,242 feet above the level of the sea. Here, again, we hav a scene upon which a volume might be written. I must omit it all.

At the junction of the Colorado Central railroad, six miles from Cheyenne, I leave my pleasant companions, and am whirled away on an express train toward Denver. I am charmed and astonished to find the Centennial state—the young Colorado—so filled with well cultivated farms, beautiful homes, well-built towns, etc. Some of these things I will describe in future letters. On the 14th inst., after a journey of six days—a journey filled with interest—I reach my destination, and am soon in the presence of three of my sisters whom I hav not seen for many years. One of them, indeed, when I saw her last was but a romping school-girl; now she has grandchildren romping about her. How the years do pass!

Yours truly, JOHN R. KELSO.

Ingersoll and Black.

The North American Review for August contains a very terse and characteristic article of twenty-one pages by Col. Ingersoll on the merits of the Christian religion. He is, as usual, strong, forcible, clear, incisiv, and crushing. His arraignment of Christianity is terrible in the extreme. His arguments and his rhetoric are peculiarly his own, and such as no man can successfully imitate.

He is followed by a reply of twenty-four pages by Judge Jeremiah S. Black, of Pennsylvania, one of the first lawyers of our day. But it must be confessed by every candid, fair-minded man who reads the discussion that the Judge utterly fails to meet the Colonel's arguments. While his article is ably written, it is made up of the assumption, laudation of Christianity, evasion, false claims, cant, and misrepresentation peculiar to a Christian lawyer and Christian clergymen. It is not known whether the discussion will be continued, but it is hoped it will. The Colonel has a fine chance to show up the Judge's false statements and dishonesty and to make the judicial, hypocritical fur fly pretty freely. We hope to be able to lay a portion of the Colonel's article before our readers in our next.

WE hav the pleasure to announce to our numerous readers that the prospects now are that we will hav company with us on our journey round the world in the person of DeWitt C. Bridges, of Bainbridge, Ind., an unmarried merchant of some thirty-four years. We hav never had the pleasure of meeting him, but he is recommended to us by a dear friend as being a worthy, companionable gentleman. We count ourselvs fortunate in having such a compagnon de voyage. We now expect to sail on the 28th or 30th inst.

THERE are still over fifty persons on the "Round-the-World List" who pledged to help us to the extent of a "V" to make the long, expensiv journey, and receive two illustrated volumes in return, who hav not yet remitted. To those we would say that if they wish to keep their promis and to hav their donations here in season to be of service to us on our journey there is now no timeto lose. This is the last call; and we hope there are not many who promised to come to our aid who will fail to keep their promises. We shall en deavor to return to each individual the value he advances. Once more, will every man "square up?"

TAU: THE KEY OF HEAVEN. Dedicated to the elect of God. In the year of the Jew, Bar-Jesus, 1881. By Anna P. Johnson. Asa K. Butts. Paper, 8vo, $1.

From the brief notice we hav given this volume we must pronounce it a novelty, iconoclastic, astrological, and Spiritualistic, claiming to hav been written by inspiration. The preface opens in this way: "The Bible (instead of being a narrativ of the Jewish events) is a relic of the long lost science of astrology. Its characters are epochs or eras of time. Its apparent histories are the astrological prophecies of the destiny of the human race."

The subjects of the different chapters are as follows: Predictions of Coming Catastrophes; Probable Cause of Second or Final Catastrophe; The Probable Age of the World; A Mysterious Change in the Human Body; Is there a God? Is there a Christ? Jehovah; The New Name; Both Satan and Christ are Love in Different Stages of Development; Hell and the Lake of Fire; Metempsychosis; The Dragon; Death; Christ the Bar-Jesus; The Life of Christ; The Obelisk.

The book will probably suit Spiritualists better than Materialists.

THE MORTALITY OF THE SOUL, and the Immortality of its Elements. The Traffic of Paradise. Preceded by an Examination of the Theory of Darwin on the Origin of Species. By A. Snider de Pellegrini, author of "Les Mysteries de la Creation Devoiles," "L' homme et sa Raison d' etre," "Nouvelle Theorie sur la Formation des Cometes," and other scientific and historical works in the French and Italian. Published by the author. Price 25 cents.

This is a translation by the author of a pamphlet published in Paris where it had a sale of many thousand copies, and the author now being a resident of this city, has favored the American people by publishing it in English. He is hardly well enough acquainted with English to render a first-class translation, but his arguments are sound and conclusiv. He takes the ground that the soul is composed of fine particles of matter, even as is the body, but at death they decompose, separate, and return to the fountains of nature from whence they were derived; that the soul is mortal, while the elements of which it is composed are themselvs immortal. His arguments are well elucidated by comparisons, and are brought to the common comprehension. Many of his arguments are new and interesting, and despite the imperfect translation are quite interesting.

THE CRIMES OF PREACHERS IN THE UNITED STATES, from May, 1876, to May, 1881. Translated out of the original newspapers, and with previous translations diligently compared and revised. By M. E. Billings, Waverly, Iowa. Price, 25 cents.

This pamphlet has been pretty well heralded, and large numbers of people are on the lookout for it and will be pleased with the clear and concise manner in which it is presented to the public. It is indeed a formidable array of the crimes of preachers for the short time of five years. The aggregate of the crimes are 917, the reverend criminals 477. Though about a hundred sorts of crime are given as having been committed by these mountebanks in religion, the principal ones are adultery, fornication, bigamy, seduction, rape, attempt at rape, sodomy, insulting ladies, improper advances, lascivious conduct, etc., though such crimes as lying, slander, falsehood, larceny, forgery, embezzlement, fraud, swindling, arson, and even murder, are charged against them.

The names of the offenders are given, the crimes of which they were guilty, the place where they lived, and the denomination to which they belonged, when the same was stated. Of the 208 reverend criminals whose sect is given, the Methodist are 30 per cent, Baptists 20, Presbyterians 10, Catholics 9, Congregational 6, Lutheran 6, Episcopalian 5, Campbellites 3, Adventists 3, United Brethren 1½, Hebrew 1, Dunkards ½, Universalists ½. We keep the pamphlet on sale.

A new paper, The Republic. Numbers 1 and 2 of this eight-page paper has been received, of which our friend A. B. Brown, of Worcester, Mass., is editor and publisher. The heading of the paper to begin with, is complicated and novel. Around the name of the paper are clustered the portraits of Franklin, Washington, Patrick Henry, Hancock, S. Adams, John Adams, Warren, Lafayette, Andrew Jackson, Clay, and Lincoln. The paper is devoted to money and labor reform and other vital questions of the day. In the opening article the editor speaks in this wise: "The Republic steps upon the plain of the American press as an advocate of pure democracy and genuin republican principles. Our motto will ever be just and equal rights and privileges for every man, woman, and child in this great nation. We shall know no sex in political rights, nor age, nor condition as a prerequisit to the full enjoyment of every benefit arising from the social and political organization."

We wish the new candidate every success, and that a large paying list may reward the editor for his outlay and toil. Address A. B. Brown, Worcester, Mass. Price, $2 a year.

A Farewell Reception.

The Fourth New York Liberal League will giv Mr. Bennett, its worthy president, a reception previous to his departure on his round-the-world trip, at the residence of Daniel E. Ryan, 231 West Thirty-seventh street, on Sunday evening, July 24th. Members of other Leagues, and all Liberals in New York and vicinity, are invited to unite with us in making the occasion one of pleasure, and to testify to the esteem in which our champion is held. We hope Mr. Ryan's spacious parlors will be crowded with friends. Let everybody who can conveniently come do so.

E. M. MACDONALD, Secretary.

Mail Rights Still Refused.

It appears that the announcement in the last Physiologist that Drs. Foote's and Kinget's journals had been restored to postal priviliges was premature. The post-office folks failed to keep faith with the party charged with negotiating terms for the proscribed publications. Every copy of either of these medical monthlies that is refused pound rates of postage is a repeated outrage against the freedom of the mails and a fresh insult to the progressiv people who patronize them. Let Liberals again arouse and carry on this fight till Comstockism shall be completely purged from the postal department. Our first duty is to make up the loss sustained by the doctors of the excessiv postage unjustly levied upon them, Dr. Foote's being over $50 per month. The Defense Association has just expended $50 as a retainer fee for securing legal redress. Funds should be forwarded direct to Dr. E. B. Foote, 120 Lexington avenue, New York. Let the tongue and pen and pocketbook of every Liberal in the land be mustered into activ service till this matter of free mails is finally settled in this country.

Parton's Life of Voltaire.

III.—L'INFAME AND THE WAR OF WIT.

The extract from Mr. Parton's work which we publish in another column shows one of the ways in which L'Infame had determined to keep its seat upon the safety-valve and repress the intelligence and progress of the French people. A royal family was then growing up in France from whence her future king would certainly come, and whose members would be the sources of government, power, and influence. The tutors of these young princes would unquestionably form their minds and probably dictate the future of France. The retrograde influences had chosen their instruments for this purpose in the person of Le Franc, Marquis of Pompignan, and his brother George, bishop of Puy. The first and elder had pretensions to literary fame. He early in 1760 had been elected to the French Academy as a preparatory step to such tutorship. The other and the younger felt also assured of his position, when Voltaire determined that The Infamous should not squat in this insidious and toad-like way upon the future government and intellect of France.

But how could he prevent it? Direct efforts would be worse than useless, if they did not indeed end in disastrous results. Power, social, political, or other, would avail nothing in this emergency where the real enemy was impalpable and the object even could not be openly avowed. But one man ever lived who possessed the weapon needful for this crisis—for such it was. That man was Voltaire, and that weapon was the most piercing, remorseless, and crushing faculty of wit and ridicule ever known. By that power only could the subtle and crafty purposes of The Infamous be met, and then only by personal warfare upon and ceaseless ridicule of its agents until they were crushed.

It is hardly too much to say that by this warfare of wit a future warfare of arms and persecution was averted. The Infamous for a time at least could not comfortably sit upon the safety-valve. The enlightened part of the French people saw the danger and fully concurred in the following remark of Dr. Quesnay to the elder Mirabeau, quoted by Mr. Parton (p. 333): "I much approve Voltaire in his hunting down the Pompignans. This bourgeois marquis, but for the ridicule with which he has been inundated, would hav been preceptor to the royal princes of France, and united to his brother George, he would hav brought back the stake and the fagot."

Voltaire opened the attack by what Mr. Parton calls a "shower of monosyllables." They were bits of tracts without name or date or traceable origin. They "snowed down" upon Paris and excited general surprise. The first was called forth by the address of the marquis on his installation at the Academy. In it he had denounced in a manner quite out of place everything that Voltaire was understood to represent, and gave himself fully to the church partisans. This called forth Voltaire's first tract, called "The Whens," that is, what a gentleman and a man of letters ought not to say WHEN he should be called to address the Academy under similar circumstances. The lesson of the tract was so high-toned and evidently proper, and so decidedly in contrast with the address of the marquis, that it was crushing. This was followed by a shower of similar tracts. The reader will see in Mr. Parton's story how the Kingbird fairly hunted these two Crows back to their country village of Pompignan by "the Tos," "the Thats," "the Hows," "the Whys," etc., which fairly stung them to desperation. They also helped the result by their stupid and sober attempts at defense, as though one could parry a swarm of bees with a sword. Voltaire once said his great prayer was, "O God, may my enemies make themselvs ridiculous," and he adds, "God has abundantly answered my prayer." These Pompignans were a part of this answer. Full of ostentation, self-conceit, and bitterness, they retreated to their country home, amid the laughter of Paris and of all intelligent France. Their scheme of tutoring princes had failed. Madame Pompadour was still able to match the Jesuits at court, and though the mistress may hav been bad, the Jesuits were far worse.

But these brothers were too important, after basking in royal favor, to be wholly extinguished in this way. We find the elder of them at Paris again a year or two after, acting as historiographer of France and seeking royal preferment. Again the Kingbird was after them, not only with his bill as before, but with his songs, which were if possible still more effectiv. The last one of eight verses Mr. Parton givs us a specimen snatch of as follows:

Nous avons vu ce beau village
De Pompignan,
Et ce marquis, brilliant et sage,
Modeste and grand,
De ces vertus premier garant.
Et vive le roi, et Simon le Franc,
Son favori,
Son favori!

Which we translate:

Oh, we hav seen this fair village
Of Pompignan!
This marquis, too, brilliant and sage,
Modest and grand,

Of his own worth first guarrantor!
Then liv the king and Simon too—
His favorit,
His favorit!

No English can giv the rhythm and wit of the original.

Such a song in French sings itself, and when set to airy music it was simply irresistible to Frenchmen. It was sung, and even sung at the Pompignans, until their only safety was a final seclusion. So L'Infame, in so far as it was impersonated in them, was crushed. Freedom, progress, and perhaps France, were saved by the bloodless strokes of wit and song.

But this was not the end of Voltaire's war of wit against the Infamous. Its representativs had determined to control not only the royal education but also literature and the theater.

As to the theater, the contest opened by the Retrogrades producing a play, Les Philosophes, in ridicule of philosophy, science, and progress. Poor Jean Jacques Rousseau and his eccentricities were made the most of for this purpose.

He was represented as coming upon the stage on all fours with a big lettuce in his pocket, having philosophically discarded the old and unstable equilibrium of only two legs, and reverted to the firmer support as well as primitiv food of original man.

The play was well done and had a great success. The tide of prejudiced and thoughtless laughter was turned against the philosophers. But the stage was Voltaire's own field, almost his home. They were silly people who thought to drive him from it, especially by his own weapons. In a week he had a new comedy ready—L'Ecossaise (the Scotch Lass). It was soon on the stage, and then the applause was unbounded, and no one doubted who was the master of wit and ridicule in French. If the philosophers did and said foolish things, they were but a tithe of what their opponents were guilty of. In provoking a comparison with Voltaire on the other side they were soon made to feel their mistake. He managed to turn their return stroke against them, too, in the most decisive manner, as follows:

The critics in opposition tried to play stupid, or to bray down the applause in vain; and when the play was printed Voltaire thought to hav them pictured on the book as an ass, sighing at a lyre hung beyond their reach in a tree. But some inkling of this design got out, and Fréron, the leader of the literary orthodox, announced that the Voltaire comedy would soon appear in print "with a portrait of the author!" Voltaire at once withdrew that "portrait," and waited until revenge could be complete. He would put it out when it could be known for whom it was meant, and when it would leave the laugh where there could be no mismistake about it. The occasion occurred soon after. To show how grandly he could rise above these squabbles and comedies he gave to the stage, and by print to the world, his Tancrede, one of the greatest dramas in the French language, the precursor of the whole romantic school of literature, a work that suggested if it did not actually giv us Goethe's Götz in German, and the Ivanhoe of Waverly in English. It proved again that Voltaire was the compeer of Corneille and Racine. The applause was unanimous. The French people bowed in homage before the genius of Voltaire interpreted by the splendid acting of Mlle. Clairon, the Melpomene of that day. Tancrede took its place at once among the French classics. But when the public saw the first copies, there was no little surprise, which soon changed to laughter, at the device on the cover. A lyre hung in a tree. Before it stood a sighing ass. Under the picture the following lines complimented the great actress and gave a blow to the stubborn critic, who had alone been silent as to her display of genius:

Que veut dire
Cette lyre?
C'est Melpomene ou Clairon.
Et ce monsieur qui soupire
Et fait rire,
N'est-ce pas Martin Freron?

This lyre, I pray,
What would it say?
Tha. our Melpomene is Clairon.
And this grave gent who sighs
And makes our laughter rise,
Is not that our Martin Freron?

Was there ever a prettier compliment to the lady or a surer way of turning the laugh upon his and her enemy? Voltaire remained master of the French stage and literature, and orthodoxy began from that time to stamp the stigma of inferiority upon the brow of its adherents.

The circles of Paris learned to believe that Credule est devenu l'equivalent de sot.
(Believer has come to mean the same as fool.)

But this publication of Tancrede brought another complication of a more serious character to the poet. The dedication was courageously made to Madame Pompadour, and in it occurred the only serious slip that Voltaire ever made with the pen. He wrote in the middle of his dedication: "If some censor could disapprove the homage which I render you, he could only be a person born with an ungrateful heart. I owe you much, Madame, and I ought to say it." By thus excusing and defending himself his very gratitude made him unwittingly reflect upon his patroness. What he did not perceive was implied, and was very soon thrown up to the mistress and her king by anonymous letters. The result was that Voltaire was "lost in the mind of Madame as well as in the king's, though he could never divine the cause." But the poet did finally remove this impression. She acknowledged the compliment by her portrait, which "adorned his house at Ferney as long as he lived," and greatly to his honor. She was his ally and the friend of the Encyclopedia. Whatever her position and demerits may hav been, it is doubtful if Voltaire could hav succeeded in his great struggle against the Infamous without her aid, and it is to his glory that he frankly and publicly acknowledged it.

This virtue of gratitude he never failed to exhibit, and it may well cover a multitude of other failings. It was indeed allied to the grandest and best quality of his nature. We have now shown how he has earned our gratitude because he led the hosts of learning, vanquished the enemies of progress by his wit, and ennobled his country and human nature by his sublime works of history and art. But there was one more, one other service greater than all of these, which has caused millions of hearts to turn to him with gratitude and tears, and will continue to do so for ages to come.

Let the reader reflect what this great quality may be until we can giv our account of it in our next.

[From the National Reformer.]

Charles Bradlaugh to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

20 CIRCUS ROAD, ST. JOHN'S WOOD, LONDON, N. W.

"SIR: I beg most respectfully to submit to your notice the following points:

"1. I am advised that the interruption on the 27th April, and my removal on the tenth May last from the House by the sergeant-at-arms when engaged—according to law and in precise compliance with the rules and orders of the House—in attempting to perform the duty of taking my seat, was on each occasion absolutely illegal, and was an infringement of my rights, and in breach of my privileges as a duly returned member of the House.

"2. I am advised that the House of Commons had not any authority either by statute or according to its own precedents to pass any resolution interrupting me or authorizing the sergeant-at-arms so to remove me, I being then in the exercise of my lawful right, and attempting the orderly performance of my legal duty.

"3. I am advised that I should hav been justified in resisting the use of the illegal and, therefore, unjustifiable physical force on the part of the sergeant-at-arms.

"4. I am advised that notwithstanding the illegality of the said forcible removal of myself by the sergeant-at-arms I hav no remedy in any court of law against the said sergeant-at-arms, as the privileges of the House of Commons protect its officer even in wrongful acts if such acts are done in pursuance of the order of the House.

"5. I am advised that the order of the House of the 10th May last, a copy of which order has been served upon me, does not authorize the sergeant-at-arms to use force, or to employ force, to prevent my reëntry into the House—to the table of which I hav been properly introduced—for the purpose of completely complying with the law in order to take my seat at the time and in the manner provided by the standing orders.

"6. That if such order should be construed to authorize the said sergeant-at-arms to attempt by force to prevent me from entering the House to complete and fulfil the duty required from me by law in the manner provided by the standing orders, then that any such user of force would be absolutely illegal, and may be lawfully resisted and overcome by me.

"I beg, therefore, sir, most respectfully to giv notice that I claim to disregard the order of the House of the tenth day of May last, and to treat the same as not requiring obedience from me, on the ground that such order is absolutely illegal. I do not dispute the power of the House, in its pleasure, to vacate my seat, if once I hav taken it. In such case it would be for the electors of Northampton to decide, on a new election, as to whom they would wish further to represent them. I do not question, nor should I resist, the authority of the House to arrest me. This right it has exercised over Englishmen far more important than myself. But I do deny, and, if it unhappily becomes necessary, shall feel it my duty to resist, the claim to prevent me, in spite of the law and by physical force alone, from complying with the return and mandate of my constituents, whose lawful representativ I am.

"In the name of the law, sir, and of my constituents, I also most respectfully giv notice that I shall, in the manner and at the time provided by the standing orders of the House, again present myself at the table of the House to complete the fulfilment of the duty imposed on me by law, and in the course of the performance of which duty I hav been most improperly and illegally interrupted and hindered.

"I—having obtained the leave of my constituents to this effect—would hav waited and would still wait the reasonable pleasure of the House as to any legislation with reference to the manner of my taking my seat, but as the House does not express any opinion on the subject, and does not challenge in any way the lawfulness of my return, it is due to my constituents that I should insist on the performance of my duty in my unchallenged lawful right, and thus put an end to a state of things without precedent in the history of Parliament.

"I hav the honor to be, sir,
"Your most obedient servant,
"4th July, 1881. "CHARLES BRADLAUGH."

(Following the above is a clear, forcible, and unanswerable letter from Mr. Bradlaugh to the Right Hon. Sir Stafford Northcote, who vigorously opposed the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh to his seat in the House of Commons, and who was joined by two hundred and nine other members to forcibly prevent Mr. Bradlaugh from occupying the seat which the people of Northampton had given him. We will be glad to lay this able letter before our readers at another time.)

The Dreadfulness of Infidelity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:
What is Infidelity? In the legitimate acceptation of the word, Infidelity signifies a disbelief in the divine origin of Christianity, and also in the representations that the Bible was written by holy men who were specially directed to write down communications which the great creator of the universe desired to hav made known to the children of men. Hence, an Infidel is one who does not believe in the divine inspiration of the holy scriptures. From boyhood to the riper years of hoary age I hav always observed that orthodox people hav given the word "Infidel" a much broader and more odious signification than the original and legitimate meaning will warrant.

From my youthful days until within a year or two past I hav been under the dominion of a dogmatic and bigoted priesthood, and I hav always been taught to think and to believe that an Infidel was the most dangerous character that could exist in any society. Children were taught to shun an Infidel as they would avoid a murderer, an unmitigated seducer, or a person of the most detestable character.

Children and youth and all adults who are accustomed to employ some one to think for them and to tell them what they must believe hav been taught that Infidelity embraces Atheism and every form of unbelief, which is not any more true than many other articles of the creed of the orthodox church.

I hav observed all through life that the orthodox clergy hav dwelt long and emphatically on the "dreadfulness of Infidelity." We were taught that an Infidel is a person who has been utterly abandoned by the great creator as an incorrigible wretch, who was to be dreaded as worse than a murderer; who was not honest in any of the commercial relations of life; who was not virtuous in society and could not act the part of a virtuous person, only as he or she was kept from crime by the terror of the civil law. We were taught that it was as impossible for an Infidel to cherish any ennobling aspirations or to perform the common duties, pleasures, and obligations of a worthy and estimable citizen as it would be for an Ethiopian to change his skin from black to white, or for a leopard to change his spots. Just so soon as a person manifests a desire to inquire after truth one single degree beyond the arbitrary limit of the creed of orthodoxy, he is reproached as drifting toward Infidelity.

But the day is coming (I see it only a few years in the distance) when any one will be permitted to do his own thinking, to soar into the vast fields of science and investigation, and to draw his own conclusions without being annoyed by the dread of being spoken of as an "Infidel." SIGMA.

New Translation.

"Behold, the day that burneth as an oven has dawned" (Mal. iv, 1).

The theologies of the past, both political and religious, are fast burning up.

The cabal at Albany, with some who hav Conkling on the brain, and some who don't seem overstocked with brain commodity, is kindling something of a fire on old political theologies.

The reverend translators of sacred scriptures hav kindled a fire on moss-covered religious theologies.

Honest men and Liberals needn't perform that drudgery. They can go about more dignified employment—giv practical demonstration of the better way—the communion of saints.

In each type of humanity we find a saint, some more and some less developed.

With these little saints we'll commune.

Let the bad alone, and it will not long show its ugly mug. Amen. PRENTISS.

P. S.—We expect the TRUTH SEEKER man to tell all the pretty things all around the world, and pass his honorable self off for a top-blossom.

Discussion.

Our Twenty-third Letter to Mr. Mair.

THE GENERAL INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

MR. G. M. MAIR, Dear Sir: In your last lengthy letter you said a good deal, and touched upon a variety of subjects, to which I wish to reply so far as my brief time and space will admit, and will try to meet your more important arguments and statements in as regular a manner as is practicable, and will endeavor to introduce no subject not treated by yourself.

Let me state right here, in reply to your complaint of my repeating in my twentieth letter the points of resemblance between Christianity and the older religions which I gave in my fourth letter, that it arose from my forgetting that I had given those points of resemblance. Writing hurriedly and at such length of time apart, without referring to what had been said in former letters, it is not perhaps strange that a repetition should occur. Those points of resemblance, however, will not be repeated in the volume containing our letters. Once will be deemed sufficient to use them.

In my last two letters I have treated of Christianity as a religion of love, and its influence in the elevation of woman. Connected with the same branch of the argument is its general influence upon civilization and welfare of the world. Thinking that I showed somewhat clearly that it has not proved itself a religion of love, and that instead of elevating woman it has tended to depress her, I think I will also be able to show that it has retarded civilization, intelligence, and the welfare of mankind. This I will endeavor to give with brevity, as time and space will not admit of lengthy arguments.

Long before Christianity made its advent into the world, science and general intelligence had gained considerable advance among men, and civilization had made great progress among many nations.

In India, Persia, China, Assyria, and Egypt thousands of years ago the learned men of those countries studied the grand science of astronomy; they mapped out the heavens with great accuracy, and were able to calculate eclipses with remarkable precision. Those countries abounded in philosophers, moralists, and teachers, who not only taught elaborately, but committed their thoughts and discoveries to writing. Succeeding them, but long before the days of Christianity, Greece and Rome made great strides in the domain of human knowledge, and reached a stage of civilization which was an honor to the race. Greece produced her Thales, Solon, Lycurgus, Bias, Pittacus, and many other distinguished men in the domain of law-making, political economy, and morals. In philosophy she had her Pythagoras, Aristhenes, Socrates, Plato, Protagoras, Diagoras, Empedocles, Aristotle, Zeno, Epicurus, Anaxagoras, Diogenes, Antisthenes, Xenocrates, Democritus, Theodorus, Carneades, and many more worthy of mention: while in the field of art, the canvas glowed under the pencil of Apelles, and the marble took divine form under the chisels of Phidias, Praxiteles, and many others. Among her poets were Homer, Hesiod, Eschylus, Sophocles, Euripedes, Isocrates, and other honored names. Among her statesmen and orators were Aristides, Pericles, and Demosthenes. In astronomy Hipparchus held high honor. In mathematics Euclid stood so high that he has since scarcely been equaled. As historians Thucydides, Herodotus, and Xenophon stood prominent. To many of these names the world has looked for knowledge, science, and art for nearly twenty-five hundred years, and even to this day many of them stand as authorities.

A correct idea of the general condition of Greece as the result of the teaching of these great minds may be had by the following quotation from Cocker's "Christianity and Greek Philosophy," pp. 47–48: "In their private life the Athenians were courteous, generous, and humane. Whilst bold and free in the expression of their opinions, they paid the greatest attention to the rules of politeness, and were nicely delicate on points of decorum. They had a natural sense of what was becoming and appropriate, and an innate aversion to all extravagance. A graceful demeanor and a quiet dignity were distinguishing traits of Athenian character. They were temperate and frugal in their habits, and little addicted to ostentation and display. . . . All their sumptuousness and magnificence were reserved for and lavished on their public edifices of art, which made Athens the pride of Greece and the wonder of the world. Intellectually, the Athenians were remarkable for their quickness of apprehension, their nice and delicate perception, their intuitional power, and their versatile genius."

It is true Greece had her vices, but not greater than have existed at later dates and under a system of religion said to have been sent from heaven for the great benefit of mankind. Had not the terrible curse of war spread over that happy land, with all the vices which follow in its train, it cannot be doubted the civilization and happiness of Greece would have continued much longer and the wretchedness, anarchy, and desolation which supervened might have been avoided.

In the Roman nation, which in many respects was a successor of Greece, a high degree of civilization was reached before the Christian era. Philosophy, literature, architecture, science, art, oratory, and the elements which constitute advanced civilization existed there before Christianity existed. I have stood in the temples erected by the people who never heard of Jesus; I have looked upon many elegant statues and paintings showing the highest degree of skill which were executed by those who had never been blessed with the gospel. The works of art taken from the ruins of Pompeii and Herculaneum, which were overwhelmed by an eruption of Vesuvius more than eighteen hundred years ago, and excavated but a few years since, are the marvel of the world; and the paintings and frescoes taken from the walls of the palaces of those cities are now the best models in the artistic world. I saw them on exhibition in the museum of Naples in great profusion, where numerous artists are constantly copying them, deeming them superior to anything since produced. I also visited the ruins of Pompeii, saw its temples, palaces, theaters, residences, etc., erected and occupied probably for hundreds of years by people who knew nothing of Jesus or his apostles. I have walked those streets which were once filled with the hum, life, and activity of civilization anterior to the time of Christianity, but which from a natural event have for eighteen centuries been silent and dead.

Yes, Rome produced her great and learned men, her generals, her orators, her poets and orators, in great numbers, and a high degree of civilization existed there prior to the advent of Christianity. Cicero is to-day the model of the purest eloquence. Statesmen go to school to those old teachers, who were pagans and not Christians in their thought, and learn from them the stately eloquence with which they used to sway the nations. Such were the might, the glory, and the beauty of pagan Greece and Rome. But the civilization degenerated and became degraded when Christianity became the ruling religion of those countries.

Renan bears good testimony relative to the tolerance of the Roman empire before Christianity: "We may search in vain the Roman law before Constantine for a single passage against freedom of thought, and the history of the imperial government furnishes no instance of a prosecution for entertaining an abstract doctrine" (Apostles, p. 250). This certainly is in wide contrast with the rule which later prevailed under Christianity, when thousands upon thousands were prosecuted, persecuted, and put to most cruel and ignominious deaths for entertaing slight differences of opinion. Of the purity and excellence of the lives of the Stoics a word from Lecky will suffice: "The austere purity of their lives, and the heroic grandeur of their deaths, kept alive the tradition of Roman liberty, even under a Nero or a Domitian. To the Stoics and the Roman lawyers is mainly due the clear recognition of the existence of a law of nature above and beyond all human enactments which has been the basis of the best moral and most influential though most chimerical speculations of later ages, and the renewed study of Roman law was an important element in the revival which preceded the Reformation" (Hist. Morals, vol. i, p. 287). The same author gives us the assurance that the golden age of the Roman law was not Christian, but pagan, and that it was under the pagan emperors that the greatest measures were taken for reducing injustice, elevating oppressed classes, and making the decline of the natural equality and fraternity of mankind the basis of legal enactments. (Vol. ii, p. 42.)

Later on Christianity was born in the diminutive country of Judea and of a people far in the background in science, refinement, and general intelligence. By the fortunes of war the banner of the cross was carried over those countries, and by the same evil influence the banners of science, art, poetry, happiness, and prosperity were trailed in the dust, and were supplanted by terror, suffering, cruelty, priestcraft, and the midnight darkness of ignorance and wretchedness. During the thousand years that followed the triumph and ascension of Christianity, gross mental darkness pervaded the land where it ruled, the light of science and learning was extinguished, and the people were left to grope in great ignorance, superstition, degradation, and the curse of priestcraft, of a type the worst the world has ever known.

To make this position clear I will give a few quotations from the ablest and most reliable historians we have to refer to. Mosheim says of the great lights of the second century: "They are worthy of little admiration on account of the accuracy or depth of their reasonings. The most of them appear to have been destitute of penetration, learning, order, application and force" (Eccl. Hist., ed. 1847, p. 53). Hallam says schools were "confined to cathedrals and monasteries," and were exclusively designed for the purposes of religion.

With respect to the morals in the early centuries, and in contradistinction to your horrible dream of what may be the state of morals when Infidelity becomes paramount, it may be proper to state that the greatest licentiousness prevailed when Christianity was still in its childhood. We learn from Hallam that love feasts became scene of drunkenness and debauchery, and as such were kept up for centuries. The commemorations of martyrs became scenes of most scandalous dissipation. Thousands of the clergy, while professing celibacy, kept mistresses in their houses under all sorts of pious but false pretexts. "Monks and virgins lived together on terms of closest intimacy, hypocritically claiming that so great was their piety that they could innocently share the same bed. Women deserted their husbands to live with new lovers. Open prostitution was common. The world grew accustomed to dangerous alternations of extreme asceticism and gross vice, and sometimes, as in the case of Antioch, it was the most vicious and luxuriant cities that produced the most numerous anchorites. . . . Public opinion was so low that many forms of vice attracted little condemnation and punishment, while undoubted belief in the absolving efficacy of superstitions rites calmed the imagination and allayed the terrors of conscience" (Middle Ages, p. 163).

Of the injurious effects of Christian civilization Lecky says, "From the very moment the church obtained civil power under Constantine the general principle of coercion was admitted and acted upon both against the Jews, the heretics, and the pagans;" also that "there were no hearts so ferocious as Christians concerning their faith."

Further, of the low morals of the early Christians, Underwood imparts the information that "an Italian bishop of the tenth century said if he were to enforce the canons against unchaste people administering the rites of the church, that duty would be reserved for boys alone; and if he were to extend the canons against bastards, they too would be excluded. At one time the clergy almost universally kept concubines, and were systematically taxed therefor. One abbot was found to have seventeen illegitimate children. Another abbot kept seventy concubines. The bishop of Liege had sixty-five illegitimate children. The nunneries were brothels. Infanticide within their walls was common. Incest was so prevalent among the clergy that it was necessary again and again to enact that no priest should live with his mother or sister. Unnatural vice was common, especially among the clergy." According to Mosheim, Hallam, Lecky and other writers, no adequate idea can be formed of the depravity of these Christian dignitaries. Is it not very sorrowful, Bro. Mair, that Infidels might become licentious if they discard Christianity?

On the score of general learning Hallam says: "Charlemagne and Alfred were the greatest scholars of their time, and Charlemagne could not read and Alfred had but an imperfect knowledge of Latin. It is very easy to produce abundant testimony of the ignorance of the times. Contracts were made verbally for want of notaries capable of drawing up charters; and these, when written, were frequently barbarous and ungrammatical to an incredible degree. For some considerable intervals scarcely any monuments of literature have been preserved except a few jejune chronicles, the vilest legends of saints, or verses equally destitute of spirit and meter. In almost every council the ignorance of the clergy forms a subject for reproach. It is asserted of one held in 992 that scarcely a single person was to be found in Rome itself who knew the first element of letters. Not one priest in a thousand in Spain, about the age of Charlemagne, could address a common letter of salutation to another. In England Alfred declares that he could not recollect a single priest south of the Thames (the most civilized part of England), at the time of his ascension, who understood the ordinary prayers or could translate Latin into his mother tongue. Nor was this better in the time of Dunstan, when, it is said, none of the clergy knew how to write or translate a Latin letter. The homilies which they preached were compiled for their use by some bishops from former works of the same kind or the writings of the Christian Fathers" (Middle Ages, ed. 1869, p. 295).

Of the great ignorance which for centuries overwhelmed the church, Mosheim says, "The beginning of that unhappy contest between faith and reason, religion and philosophy, piety and genius, which increased in succeeding ages, and is prolonged even to our times with a violence which renders it extremely difficult to be brought to a conclusion." That Christians of that age entertained a great indifference toward pagan learning is obtained from various writers. Among the monks, when under a vow of silence, they were accustomed, when asking for any pagan work, to make a particular sign, which consisted in scratching the ears like a dog, because they regarded the pagans as dogs. In this manner such writers as Virgil, Horace, and Ovid were designated.

"The fourth Council of Carthage forbade the reading of secular books by bishops. Jerome condemned the use of them except for pious purposes. The physical sciences were unqualifiedly condemned, as their cultivation was considered incompatible with the practice of religious duties. The Greek schools of medicine were closed. The Alexandrian Serapion, with its libraries and museums, the accumulation of centuries, was destroyed under the episcopate of Theophilus, A.D. 389, and twenty years afterward the empty shelves excited the regret and indignation of every intelligent spectator." (See article Alexandria, Encyclopedia Britannica, eighth edition.)

It is related of many of the bishops in the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon that they could not write their names. Ignorance was by no means considered a disqualification for high ecclesiastical positions. Slight importance was attached to anything of an intellectual character save the insipid and childish controversies which were kept up for centuries. Hallam tells us that "these disputes diverted studious minds from profane literature and narrowed down more and more the circle of that knowledge which they were desirous to obtain" (page 453).

It is easy to perceive what encouragement the church gave to learning, and the extent to which the monastic movement contributed to the general ignorance. Hallam explains: "I cannot conceive any state of society more adverse to the intellectual improvement of mankind than one which admitted no middle line between dissoluteness and fanatical mortifications. . . . After the introduction of monkery, with its unsocial theory of duties, the serious and reflecting part of mankind, on whom science most relies, were turned to habits which, in the most favorable view, could not quicken the intellectual energies; and it might be a difficult question whether the cultivators and admirers of useful literature were less likely to be found among the profligate citizens of Rome and their barbarous conquerors, or the melancholy recluses in the wilderness" (page 453).

This same author again says, "No original writer of any merit arose, and learning, though plunged for but a short period into mere darkness, may be said to have languished in a middle region of twilight for the greater part of a thousand years." And again, "A cloud of ignorance overspread the whole face of the church, hardly broken by a few glimmering lights, who owed almost the whole of their distinction to the surrounding darkness."

And still again: "France reached her lowest point at the beginning of the eighth century; but England was at that time more respectable, and did not fall into complete degradation until the middle of the ninth. There could be nothing more deplorable than the state of Italy during the succeeding century."

What literature there was in existence was stored up in the monasteries where it could be of no possible use to the masses; they groped in utter darkness, and no attempt save in very rare cases was made on the part of the people to acquire learning. And such manuscripts as were in the custody of the monks were defaced, obliterated, and monkish additions made to them which possessed not the slightest value. Lecky says, "Not till the education of Europe passed from the monasteries to the universities, not till science and classical Freethought and industrial independence broke the scepter of the church, did the intellectual revival of Europe begin" (Hist. Morals, vol. ii, p. 206).

A slight improvement began in the tenth century; a feeble light sprung from Moorish Spain began to penetrate the surrounding gloom, but for a long time the gain was very slow. Had it not been, however, for the Moors of Spain, who despised the Christian religion and who treasured up what science and learning there was in Europe, and who retained the seed or nucleus from which light ultimately broke forth, no man knows into what a state of ignorance and degradation Europe might to-day have been plunged. Both Mosheim and Prof. Draper clearly show that the followers of Mohammed in Spain were the custodians of the learning that afterward blessed Europe. The Christian church showed itself the enemy of learning, while the Mohammedans were its stanchest friends.

In describing the manner in which the light of learning penetrated the darkness of the middle ages, Prof. Draper says: "In the intellectual history of Arabism the Jew and the Saracen are continually seen together. It was the same in their political history, whether we consider it in Syria, in Egypt, or in Spain. From them conjointly western Europe derived the philosophical ideas which in the course of time culminated in Averroism. Averroism is philosophical Islamism. Europeans usually regard Averroes as the author of these heresies, and the orthodox brand him accordingly, but he was nothing more than their collector and commentator. His works invaded Christendom by two routes; by Spain through southern France they reached upper Italy, engendering numerous heresies on their way; from Sicily they passed to Naples and south Italy under the auspices of Frederick II." (Conflict Between Religion and Science, p. 124).

According to Mosheim, it was under the reign of the celebrated Khadif Almamum, in 833, that the Arabians began to take pleasure in the Grecian learning and to propagate it by degrees, not only in Syria and Africa, but also in Spain and Italy; and from this period they gave us a long catalogue of celebrated philosophers, physicians, astronomers, and mathematicians who were monuments to their nation through the several succeeding ages, and in this certainly they do not boast without reason.

"After this period the European Christians profited much by the Arabian learning, and were highly indebted to the Saracens for improvement in the various sciences, for the mathematics, astronomy, physics, and philosophy that were taught in Europe from the tenth century were, for the most part, drawn from the Arabian schools, and were established in Spain and Italy, or were the writings of Arabian sages. Hence the Saracens may in one repect be justly considered the restorers of learning in Europe" (Ecclesiastical History, vol. i, p. 211).

Again the same author says, "The Arabians, during this whole century [the tenth], preserved that noble passion for the arts and sciences which had been kindled among them in the preceding age, and hence their country abounded with physicians, mathematicians, and philosophers, whose names and characters, together with an account of their respective abilities, are given by Leo Africanus and the other literary historians" (page 241).

Of the advance in the eleventh century, the same author continues: "The school of Salernum, in the kingdom of Naples, was renowned above all others for the study of physics in this century, and vast numbers crowded thither from all the provinces of Europe to receive instruction in the art of healing; but the medical precepts that rendered the doctors of Salernum so famous were all derived from the schools of the Saracens in Spain and Africa" (page 260).

Several of the quotations given are selected from Mrs. Annie Besant's debate with the Rev. Mr. Hatchard and B. F. Underwood's "Influence of Christianity."

I cannot take the space to follow the struggle between the church and the aspirants for learning and science succeeding the tenth century, when, as we have seen, learning began to spread; but it is true, as Mrs. Besant remarked: "Whenever a mind struggled to think, Christianity promptly shut it up. In Spain itself, one hundred and nineteen men were imprisoned by the Inquisition, not for heresy, but for science. Roger Bacon, a monk of the thirteenth century, bears witness to the prevailing ignorance: 'Without mathematical instruments no science can be mastered,' he complains sadly, 'and these instruments are not to be found among the Latins, and could not be made for two or three hundred pounds.' . . . The admirable works of Cicero de Republican are not to be found anywhere, so far as I can hear, though I have made anxious inquiry for them in different parts of the world and by various messengers. I could never find the works of Seneca, though I made diligent search for them during twenty years and more. And so it is with many more useful books connected with the science of morals' (Green's Short History of the English People, ed. 1878, pp. 133, 134). His own studies were rewarded with bread and water and a dungeon, and pen and paper were taken from him. He died in the prison of his monastery. In the same spirit Torquemada burnt six thousand priceless oriental books. Not a single great discovery brightens Christendom from the time whereat Christianity destroyed pagan science until the stir of mental life brought about heresy. Calvin, among reformers, hated knowledge as Torquemada among the Romanists. Calvinists hunted Bruno from Geneva if Catholics burned him at Rome. Later, Buckle gives a long list of learned men imprisoned merely for their science." (See History of Civilization, vol. ii, pp. 220–242, ed. of 1869).

The cruel treatment meted to Copernicus and Galileo, the bitter opposition which the new art of printing met with from the church, the disfavor with which every struggle of scientific knowledge was met, together with the fact that for a hundred years and down to our own times the ablest scientists, the ripest scholars, and the deepest thinkers have been without the church and at enmity with it, together with all the facts in the matter, are sufficient to show that the church has been opposed to the advance of learning and science, and that Christianity has thrown civilization back more than a thousand years. It is clear to understand by the unprejudiced mind that civilization and learning have advanced in spite of Christianity rather than with its help.

In estimating the influence that Christianity has exercised upon civilization, and upon the education of the world, these facts should always be borne in mind:

1. Jesus, if he lived, was an uneducated person, and taught no new scientific or philosophic truth.

2. His apostles and disciples were unlettered men, and, like him, taught no new truths of science or philosophy.

3. While some of the early Fathers who adopted Christianity were men of education in Grecian and Roman literature, it was soon lost sight of; educated men in the church soon became very scarce.

4. Education was steadily discouraged by the church; former civilization and education were abandoned, and the grossest ignorance and darkness overspread the clergy and the people when Christianity was at its strongest.

5. For many centuries the students, the scientists, and the men of learning found more opposition from the church than from any other source. Learning was regarded as an enemy to Christianity, while ignorance all along the centuries has been considered entirely compatible with godliness.

6. The church has persistently shown enmity to scientists and educated men, and this is apparent down to the present time. The scientists of our own period are opposed, misrepresented, and ridiculed by none as by the ardent advocates of Christianity. The way in which you have several times spoken disrespectfully of scientists in the course of this discussion, and particularly in your last letter, is a fair sample of Christian hatred of science. If Christians have later adopted scientific and literary studies in the colleges and universities it is because of the public demand for it, and the improved tastes of the age; but they undertake to subordinate it all to the dogmas of theology, and ecclesiasticism is always held to be superior to it.

7. The true conservators of learning in the dark ages were the Infidel Mussulmans, and but for them the world would much longer have been cursed with darkness and ignorance.

8. Christianity has from the first sustained tyranny, oppression, and slavery, since Paul said: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation" (Rom. xii, 1, 2); and Peter also: "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors. . . . Honor the king" (1 Peter ii, 13, 14, 17). From that day to this priestcraft and kingcraft have gone together, and both have ruled over men by divine right. Submission and passive obedience have been the watchwords of the church. Mosheim thought that Constantine turned Christian because he saw "the admirable tendency of the Christian doctrine and precepts to promote the stability of government by preserving the citizens in their obedience to the reigning powers." The same historian also thought that Charlemagne converted the Saxons to Christianity for the same reason, hoping that the same gospel would "induce them to submit more tamely to the government of the Franks." In all the conflicts that have arisen between the people and their rulers, orthodoxy has always been for the complete submission of the people.

9. Christianity has persistently sustained the worst form of slavery that has existed in the world, and during the eighteen centuries of its rule scarcely lifted its finger in opposition to it. The most sturdy advocates of liberty, the most steadfast opponents of slavery, have been from the ranks of unbelievers—Infidels.

10. The church has persecuted and taken life in the most cruel manner and on the largest scale for exercising the right of opinion.

11. The church deprived women of the rights she held under Grecian, Roman, and German rule, and reduced her to a state of utter dependence, submission, and slavery.

12. Thus Christianity has stood in deadly opposition to the advance of civilization and the best interests of the race. The civilization that has taken place within the past five hundred years has been in consequence of the progressive nature of man, and because the natural aspiration of man when untrammeled by the fetters of theology is to liberty, knowledge, and happiness. When it is claimed for Christianity that it is to be credited with our learning and our civilization, and the liberties we enjoy, the claim is false.

13. It must be held that Christianity, therefore, has sustained ignorance, slavery, the degradation of woman, the infliction of torture, and the taking of life, and held back the advancement and happiness of the human race.

JESUS AND HIS TEACHINGS.

I will next review what you have to say of Jesus and the character of his teachings. You undoubtedly entertain a higher opinion of him than I do. I am, however, quite willing to admit—if I can be convinced that such a person as Jesus had a real existence—that he was an amiable, well-disposed, democratic person, but of limited information, with no very original traits of character, and certainly no proofs of divinity or of unusual ability. But as has already been shown in this discussion, there is no proof that such a person really existed, nor, if his existence is conceded, that his maxims and teachings were correctly reported. It must not be forgotten that he wrote nothing himself, and that what he is reported as having uttered was not written till after he had been dead many years, varying, as we have seen, in the opinions of different writers, from thirty to one hundred and fifty years. Waving th great discrepancy between the story of the three synoptic gospels and the fourth gospel accorded to John, the utter difficulty of getting anything like a correct report of his teachings cannot be lost sight of. It can scarcely be thought reasonable that any person's remarks could not be correctly transmitted under such circumstances.

To prove that there is something more than human in the character and teachings of Jesus you quote the extravagant language of Rousseau, which he put into the mouth of the Savoyard vicar. It might be considered nearly as just to quote the language which Shakspere put into the mouths of Iago or Shylock and then claim they were his own private sentiments. But, dear sir, you show your lack of honesty by not giving the entire quotation. The closing part of it quite upsets the opinion he put into the vicar's mouth, and you take very good care to withhold it. Let me finish the quotation regarding the story of Jesus: "This same gospel is full of things incredible—of things which reason has in aversion, and which it is impossible for any man of sense to conceive or admit." This, the reader will see, puts a very different face upon Rousseau's opinion of the story of Jesus and his wonderful deeds. But after Rousseau had served your purpose and spoken highly of your ideal, how easy it was in the same letter to say unkind words of him and cast him aside as an object of contempt. "Oh, for the rarity of Christian charity!"

It is my candid opinion that if a rational view is taken of the conduct and teachings attributed to Jesus they will be found to not possess the exalted qualities, morally or intellectually, usually accorded to them. It cannot be denied, according to the narrative, that Jesus led a sort of vagabond life. He wandered over the small country where he was born much as the class of men called "tramps" nowadays walk over ours, and his companions were of a similar class. They performed no labor, doing nothing to cultivate the earth, to embellish nature, or to provide for future wants. His instructions to others enjoined them to follow the same kind of life. He said, "Take no thought for the morrow, what ye shall eat," etc. The savages who now act upon this principle lead most wretched and useless lives. The lilies and sparrows are poor patterns for healthy, active human beings, in making the struggle of life.

Plucking the corn of others' planting would not now be regarded as an honest mode of living. Many of the older moral teachers of the world set better examples than this.

In my tenth letter I hurriedly gave you some fifty instances in the teachings and conduct of Jesus which seem too imperpect to be the production of a perfect god. In replying to what you now adduce in his favor it may not be amiss to allude to some of them again, as well as to others.

It is questionable advice to one who has recently married a wife to neglect her and make no provision for her.

The injunction, "Let the dead bury the dead," cannot be regarded as specially luminous.

The sending of idle, filthy beggars to Abraham's bosom as a reward for indolence and mendicancy may well be regarded as questionable. To teach man to gain a competence by industry and frugality, as Confucius did, would seem far better.

His speaking in dark parables that his hearers might see and not perceive, hear and not understand, seems not the best mode of teaching. It is hardly in keeping with the injunction, "Do as you would have others do to you."

"Love your enemies" is a hard command to keep. Few have been able to do so. He seems not to have done it himself, for he denounced his enemies and called them very hard names, as fools, blind guides, hypocrites, vipers, serpents, etc.

His saying, "But these mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me," does not indicate a merciful, beneficent spirit, though the words were part of a parable. It would indeed be a very summary way for a ruler to dispose of his subjects.

His making a whip or scourge of small cords and beating and driving the dealers in doves and the changers of money was hardly in keeping with a god of endless mercy and kindness. Was it loving them if they were his enemies?

The consigning of men and women to eternal damnation and burning because of their inability to believe seems like extreme cruelty and injustice. Belief is not a matter of choice, but of evidence. A man cannot believe just what he is commanded to believe, but he must first be convinced.

The command to bind hand and foot and cast into outer darkness the man who had no wedding garment seems very severe, for the man was evidently one who had obeyed the injunction, "take no thought for the morrow."

If it is blessed to be a peacemaker, why should he say he came not to bring peace but a sword. The contradiction is plain.

His injunction to hate father, mother, brother, sister, wife, and children seems far below the maxim taught by Confucius, Thales, and many of the old teachers, "Honor your father and mother, love your brothers and sisters."

His treatment of his own mother seems not filial or dutiful; when she told him in Jerusalem that she had sought him sorrowing, his reply was curt and without affection. When at the wedding she told him that the wine was out, he ungraciously said, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" It does not appear that he ever called her by the endearing name of "mother." When on another occasion, when speaking to a crowd, he was told that his mother wished to speak with him, he showed impatience and said, "Who is my mother?"

I will not, however, stop to recall all the points in his conduct and teaching that are open to criticism, but it is easy to perceive that he was not perfect and without fault, and undoubtedly only an ordinary human being. He was born as others are; he ate and grew as others do; he had his likes and dislikes with the falibilities common to mortals, with, perhaps, a degree of superiority over the bulk of the human race.

You claim that he died to save the world. How his death could affect the world is not easy to understand. Hundreds are dying every day and every hour without seriously affecting the world. As a sacrifice, his death could not possess remarkable virtue. If he was God, and had before dwelt in the regions of happiness, his existence among the hills of Judea must have been most irksome. To leave such an unpleasant life for the happy mansion in the skies must have been an agreeable change.

Even if his sufferings were extreme, they lasted but a very few hours. If his sufferings were a virtue they fell far short of what many have endured on the torture rack for days together in various painful positions and on beds of sickness and suffering. Why it was more for him to die than any other human being is hard to realize. If he was really a God, and his home was in heaven, and he could not return there only through the portal of death, he should have been joyful to pass through it; but how his death could affect the countless millions of others who lived and died before him and since is all in the imagination of his followers and worshipers. That a God of infinite love and mercy could take any delight in the suffering and death of any person, especially of his own beloved son, is a monstrous conception and abhorrent to every noble sentiment of human nature. As I have sufficiently shown, this conception of expiation—the appeasing of the vindictive spirit of the gods by the death of men and animals—is of pagan origin in the dark ages of the past, and justly should be abhorrent to every lover of beauty and justice.

With all the loveliness and excellence which the admirers of Jesus are pleased to accord to him, with all the veneration they may feel for his amiable character, should a man now appear in the world and do precisely as he did in every respect—wander from place to place with a band of idle followers at his heels, without any visible means of support, never performing a day's labor, setting himself up as a god, and to know more than all others—he would be regarded as an insufferable pretender and fraud. Probably not a member of the Christian churches of the day would recognize him or affiliate with him, and very likely he would be arrested as a vagabond and thrown into prison at hard labor with thieves and felons. It cannot be believed that one of the respected and salaried clergymen who at this day derive honor and gold by preaching Jesus and him crucified would affiliate with or even notice just such a character, who would do precisely as Jesus did. They would spurn him and cast him from them; they would not deem him a god; they would not believe him the creator of the universe; they would regard him as a man infinitely inferior to themselves. But because myself and others cannot believe that a person who lived just in this way nearly nineteen hundred years ago was God, or anything more than a man, you and all your brother Christians think we ought to be sent to hell and roast for it. If such a character as Jesus would not be lovely now, if such a person would not be acceptable to the taste of the better portion of the community to-day, how could he be lovely or acceptable eighteen hundred years ago? What would not be divine now could not have been divine then.

The great question which cannot be positively settled is, Did such a person have an existence? Was he a man or myth? Either is quite possible, and though a myth, it is as easy to admire his reputed traits of character as to admire the qualities of Horus, Apollo, Balder, St. Nicholas, Aladdin, William Tell, Robinson Crusoe, John Bull, Miss Britannica, Brother Jonathan, or Miss Columbia, all of whom are only myths—creatures of the imagination. How many thousands of millions of children have fondly contemplated Saint Nicholas, or Santa Claus, and wondered what kind of a reward he would bring them at Christmas time—the birthday of Jesus! To their minds he is a reality, a great and beneficent being who dispenses blessings to all good little children. Does their faith make it so? How many thousands have read with absorbing interest about William Tell and Robinson Crusoe, of their brave deeds, of the perils they passed through and the honors they achieved! To the confiding minds of the young readers those characters have had a real bona fide existence—a reality—and probably they have just about as much as had Jesus. The confiding believers in Jesus see him, adore him, love him, just as the other confiding believers in Tell and Crusoe see, adore, and love them. I perceive but little difference; and the proofs of existence in one case are just about as strong as in the others. Legends are all we have in either. Where the proofs are so slight and uncertain it is clearly very ill-advised to repose undue confidence in them.

PROPHECIES OF THE BIBLE.

You again turn to prophecies as an argument to sustain your position, though I thought we had discussed that subject somewhat fully in our seventh letters. I showed that predicting or prophesying has been common in all ages and nations. Thousands of persons have attempted to predict future events, some with good success, but many more with ill. This penchant for prophecy still prevails. The weather is prophesied every day in advance, and the hits are generally good hits. Thousands prophesied last year that Garfield would be elected, while nearly as great a number predicted that Hancock would be the fortunate man. Half were false prophets and half were true, but there was very little miracle or inspiration on either side. I gave you two or three instances of the remarkable fulfilment of prophecies by different persons. One was a Hindoo prophecy, another of the French Revolution by St. Cesaire, either of which was quite as remarkable as any prophecy in the Bible. The account of the latter is to be found in a book entitled "Liber Mirabilis," which has been verified at the King's Library in Paris—far better proofs than the Bible prophecies have—where there is an original copy. The prophecy reads in this way: "The administration of France shall at a future and distant period be so blinded that they shall leave it without defenders. The hand of God shall extend itself over them, and likewise over all the rich; all the nobles shall be deprived of their states and dignities—division shall spring up in the church of God, and there shall be two husbands, the one true and the other adulterous—the former shall be put to flight. There shall be great carnage, and as great an effusion of blood as in the time of the Gentiles. The universal church and the whole world shall deplore the destruction of a celebrated city, the capital and mistress of France. The altars of the temple shall be destroyed; the holy virgins, razed out, shall fly from their convents, and the church shall be stripped of her temporal goods; but at length the black eagle and the lion shall appear, arriving from other countries. Then misery be to thee, oppressed city of opulence! Thou shalt at first rejoice, but thy end shall come. Misery be to thee, O city of philosophy! Thou shalt be subjected; a captive king, humbled even to the dust, shall at last recover his crown and shall destroy the city of impurity."

Although this prophecy was made long before the sad events occurred, the fulfilment was remarkable. Had it been made by Isaiah or Jeremiah, Christians would have made great ado over it. A writer in describing the fulfilment says: "The vassal, who looked not on the noble as his natural protector and guardian, but as an oppressor, arose against him, the soldier against the officer, the officer against the general, and the servant against his master, chaos was again restored, the holy altars were overturned, the convents defiled and pillaged, nobles reduced to the rank of private citizens, to save even life itself. The humblest of citizens and menials arose to power and despotism—so dreadfully was this prophecy fulfilled. At length even the black eagle, the ensign of the northern power, and the lion, that of Britain, gained possession of Paris, the self-dignified city of philosophy, stripped her of her ill-gotten spoil, and as a punishment of her abuse of power over other states, caused again to rule over her a king, that may have been truly said to have been humbled even to the dust."

Cooper with much truth says: "This prophecy is worth all the Bible prophecies put together. Not one of them is fulfilled so literally. And yet it is made by one who had no pretensions to divine inspiration; made, too, more than twelve hundred years before the circumstances referred to occurred."

Prophecy does not necessarily imply or prove superhuman agency. Any person of good mind can judge by existing facts what the future may turn out. Lincoln, before he was president, acted the part of a prophet when he said, "This nation cannot remain permanently half-slave and half-free." Rousseau was a prophet when he predicted the French Revolution. The negro woman who prophesied of Josephine, when the latter was a mere girl, that she would one day be empress of France was more definite and remarkable than anything of the kind in the Bible. There are also hundreds of gypsies and fortune-tellers who hav predicted coming events, and often they do so with singular accuracy. It can hardly be supposed that an infinite intelligence inspires them to say what they do, but perhaps those just as much as a similar class of predictors among the Jews.

You seem to think there is something very remarkable and divine about the prophecies regarding Babylon, but upon an investigation it will be found less accurate and less definite than many prophesies that have been made by persons who laid no claim to inspiration or divine aid. Let us look a little into the facts as they exist regarding the condition of Babylon subsequent to the time when the predictions of Isaiah and Jeremiah were made. I will give some quotations from Layard's "Nineveh and Babylon," the highest authority we have on those countries, as selected by Underwood. They will show how far the predictions have lacked of being fulfilled.

"After the defeat of Darius and the overthrow of the Persian supremacy, Babylon opened its gates to Alexander, who deemed the city not unworthy to become the capital of his mighty empire" (p. 454).

"The last blow to the prosperity and even existence of Babylon was given by Saleucus, when he laid the foundation of the new capital in the banks of the Tigris, B. C. 322. Only a few Chaldeans continued to dwell around the ruins of the sacred edifices" (p. 455).

"Still, however, a part of the population appears to have returned to their former seats, for in the second century of the Christian era we find the Parthian king Evemerus sending numerous families from Babylon into Media, to be sold as slaves, and burning many great and beautiful edifices still standing in the city" (p. 455.

"In the time of Augustus the city is said to have been entirely deserted, except by a few Jews, who still lingered among the ruins" (ib).

"Among the heaps that marked the site of ancient Babylon herself there arose in the seventh century the small town of Hillah" (ib).

Hillah may contain 8,000 or 9,000 inhabitants. A few half-ruined mosques and public baths are its buildings. Its bazar supplies the desert Arabs with articles of clothing, arms, dates, coffee, corn, and contains a few Manchester goods and English cutlery. Around the town and above and below it for some miles are groves and palm trees forming a broad belt on both sides of the river" (p. 457).

"A theory put forward first by Col. Rawlinson, I believe, that the ruins around Hillah do not mark the site of the first Babylon, has, I presume, been abandoned" (p. 456). "Hillah, like most towns in this part of Turkey, is peopled by Arabs, once belonging to different tribes, and now forgetting their clanships in a sedentary life. They maintain, however, a friendly intercourse with the Bedouins, and with the wild inhabitants of the marshes" (p. 447).

"From the summit of Birs Nimroud I gazed over a vast marsh, for Babylon is made a possession for the 'bittern and pools of water.' In the midst of the swamps could be faintly distinguished the mat huts of the Kazail, forming villages on the small island. The green morass was spotted with the black buffalo. The Arab settlements showed the activity of a hive of bees" (p. 427).

"Shortly after my arrival in Hillah I visited the Birs Nimroud, accompanied by Zaid and a company of well-armed Agayls. Spying a party of the Kazail Arabs retreating from the marshes with their tents and cattle, they fell upon them, and under my shadow carried off a few cows and sheep, inflicting at the same time time some severe lance wounds upon the owners" (p. 422).

To these quotations from Layard Underwood adds these appropriate comments: "Thus we see that the city which was to be destroyed by a great army 'from the north country,' the city whose time was near at hand, whose days, it was declared, should not be prolonged, which was to be 'perpetual desolation,' after the Jewish captivity, and never to be inhabited nor dwelt in from generation to generation, where the Arab was never to pitch his tent even; the city which was to 'be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah,' was a large and important city after the prophecies were written and after the captivity of the Jews; that Alexander intended to make it the seat of his great empire; that afterward it declined gradually like other ancient cities, yet 'Jews still lingered among the ruins' in the time of Augustus; that in the second century of the Christian era it still contained inhabitants and 'many great and beautiful edifices still standing;' that at a later date Hillah arose on the site of the ancient city; that the town has now a population of from eight to nine thousand, and is peopled chiefly by Arabs; that other portions of the ground on which ancient Babylon stood are inhabited by Arabs whose settlement shows 'the activity of a hive of bees,' while all around the green morass is spotted with flocks of the black buffalo; and that a British traveler actually saw Arabs with their tents retreating from the marshes which form a part of the site of the old city.

"Is should be borne in mind that according to the ancient historian, Herodotus, Babylon formed a perfect square of sixty miles—fifteen on each side. The same historian informs us that the whole plain of Babylon in the past has been subject to inundations, and that the city was protected by artificial canals and embankments, kept in repair at vast expense. There was, therefore, nothing improbable in the idea that a portion of the ground on which Babylon stood would sometime become 'pools of water;' but when the fiery old Hebrew prophets declared, in pronouncing Babylon's doom, that the destruction of the city should be speedy and its desolation complete, and proceeded to give particulars of its future condition, they put on record what in the light of present knowledge must be regarded as proof of the unreliable character of their prophetic writings, and evidence that they wrote not by divine inspiration, but from intense hatred of their oppressor and from impatience of her destruction.

"Nelson and some other writers have attempted to vindicate the correctness of the prophecies to which I have referred by quotations from Rollin and Volney; but it seems not to occur to many who still quote these old authors that discoveries made since their death render their work of no value, so far as they relate to the site or condition of Babylon, not to mention other cities named in the Bible."

There is nothing for me to add to this. It clearly appears that Jewish prophets widely missed the mark in their predictions, and we are forced to the conclusion that they could not have been moved by a being of infinite truth, and that what they did say possesses no special value. It will not do for infinite perfection to be inaccurate.

THE PROPHET DANIEL.

Next comes the wild, erratic talk about a great image with a head of gold, breast and arms of silver, belly and thighs of brass, legs of iron, feet of iron and clay mixed, with a stone, which smote this image, etc. This incoherent gibberish you adduce as a proof of Christianity. It must be a weak cause that requires such support. To me it seems a weak prop, indeed, and for two reasons. In the first place, the riddle is so wild and obscure that it cannot be understood, and more ingenuity is required to imagine a meaning than to invent the dream in the first place, or any good it could do after invented; second, because the entire representation of the dream, vision, or prophecy is untrue. It is purported to have been written by Daniel at the time of the Jewish captivity in Babylon, 537 B.C. Nothing of the kind was the case. It was not written nor known till nearly four hundred years later, as the Rev. John W. Chadwick clearly shows in his "Bible of To-day," and whose position is sustained by DeWette and other profound Bible scholars. Chadwick says: "Next after Ezekiel, Daniel. The logical order is correct, but not the chronological. Daniel is the next great apocalyptist, but his true date is 425 years after that of Ezekiel, about 165 years B.C. He would be the last of the prophets in a chronological order, if he were indeed a prophet. But he can hardly be considered one, his whole genius and method are so entirely different from that of the great prophets of the eighth century B.C., who give to the prophecy its typical form. The book of Daniel was the last book admitted into the Jewish canon, and it was admitted very grudgingly. It was never placed among the prophets by the Jews. It was left for Christians to perpetrate this piece of literary folly. True, it professes to have been written, after the sixth chapter, in the time of the captivity. 537 B.C. is the marginal date, which is based upon the text. It is a description of visions had by the prophet Daniel in Babylon. No other book of the Old Testament has played a greater part in the development of Christian ideas. It was the great stronghold of the defenders of predictive prophecy in England in the eighteenth century. But now its gates are broken down; its wall is flat. There is not a repectable critic who disputes that it was written in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, from 170 to 165 B.C. The writer's object was to strengthen the faithful among the Jewish people under the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes, and to encourage them with the hope of a speedy deliverance. Even as an acknowledged fiction, it was well adapted to its purpose. How much better as a veritable prophecy of the time of the captivity! This it professed to be. Speaking squarely, it was a pious fraud. It was pious. The man who wrote the book was an earnest patriot, filled with an honest hatred of injustice. He had a noble end in view—to strengthen and console his fellow-countrymen. He thought it justified the means. But these were fraudulent. A book written 165 B.C. was put forth as a book written 537 B.C. But the subjective immorality of such an act as this was not then what it would be now. Then there was not the sense of ownership in books that there is now. The copyist easily glided into the redactor. He added and he took away to suit his own ideas. It was a very common thing, especially a little later in the first Christian centuries, to try to float one's book with the great name of some apostle or Father in the church. The apocryphal books of Esdras are a case in point, Esdras being the Greek form of Ezra, and these books, written hundreds of years after his death, pretending to be written by him. Other instances are the Wisdom of Solomon, the Book of Enoch, attributed in the New Testament to the 'Seventh from Adam,' but actually written a little before Christ, and some of it a little after; in the New Testament, the fourth gospel and various epistles" (Bible of To-day, pp. 17, 18, 19).

As the book of Daniel, then, is clearly a fiction—not written by Daniel, and the person who did write it is wholly unknown—as it is much of the same wild, visionary, unmeaning character as the book of Revelation in the New Testament; as it is not worth the thousandth part of the time that has been spent in poring over it, if possible to catch its hidden meaning; as the end of the world upon the assertions of this book has many times been set, but always falsely set, as the world still revolves and probably will continue to do so for ages to come; as there is nothing about the book of the slightest value to people of the present day, save as a specimen of the literature of its time, and as a matter of curiosity, it must be regarded as very poor proof in favor of Christianity, and must be set aside with all the other rubbish brought in its defense. Far better proof than this vision of a wholly fictitious Daniel will have to be hunted up and brought forward to sustain your system, or it might as well be abandoned as a lost cause—a collection of absurdities without verification.

This letter has already reached considerable length, and I will defer what else I have to say in reply to you till my next, which will close our discussion.

Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

Our Religion vs. Our Republic.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The fact cannot be much longer concealed that our religion is the deadly enemy of our republic. The one based on the belief that the universe is the creation and subject of a supreme, invisible ruler; the other that the powers that govern are derived from the governed, are antagonisms that can never be reconciled. One of the two must eventually go under.

As it is useless to contend over derived conditions without regard to the law that produced them, to test this question of supremacy I deny that a shadow of evidence can be found in the organic law by which we exist as individuals that sustains belief in the supremacy of the unseen over the seen, but, on the contrary, the same interchanging relations that exist between the roots and top of the vegetable exist between the visible animal, an invisible counterpart, each being equally necessary to the existence of the other. Man bearing the same relation to lower grades of animal life that the tree does to lower grades of vegetation, the same law of combination that makes higher numbers from lower ones, larger streams from small ones, makes higher grades of being from lower ones, including all that constitutes their individuality.

Belief in an oligarchy of spirit over matter is the last expiring effort of a superstition that has made our world a human slaughter-house and whitened the plains of earth with the bones of its victims; that burned heretics, hung witches, dragged William Lloyd Garrison through the streets of Boston for asserting the right of a man to own himself, and closed the doors of every church and lecture-room against him, except that of the Atheist, Abner Kneeland, and he imprisoned sixty days for expressing a doubt of the existence of a universal monarch; imprisoned the editor of The Truth Seeker thirteen months under the flimsy pretext of sending obscene matter through the mails, and is now feasting on the life-blood of our republic.

The question that agitates the world to-day is simply this, Are the two conditions that constitute the sexes and all opposits distinct entities or interchanging relations? Or, in other words, are the powers that govern derived from the governed or from a source of being that is independent of them? On our answer to this question depends the fate of our republic. J. Tinney.

It is struggling against Comstock and his postal law for its very existence, but it still livs, and it depends upon its friends as to how long it will liv and how much good work it will accomplish. It pleads for right generation and less of it. It works for the good of the whole race. We wish to create a new public sentiment which will insist that only kind, loving, and beautiful men, women, and children shall be born into the world. What we are depends mainly upon what our parents are. Immoral and depraved parents cannot generate good and virtuous children. Diseased parents cannot giv to their children the birthright of sound minds in healthy bodies. Drunken and intemperate parents cannot produce temperate offspring. Licentious and lustful parents cannot giv to the world pure and chaste boys and girls. We wish to offer to all persons the truths of right generation so that "fewer and better children" will be the result. We ask all lovers of humanity to do something for this great and glorious work.

The Godly Women of the Bible.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENUTRY.

MARY MAGDALENE, JOANNA, SUSANNA, "THE OTHER MARY," AND SALOME.

This notorious character, Mary Magdalene, comes before us for the first time in Luke viii, 2, the chapter succeeding the sinner-anointing. Here we are told that there were with Jesus in addition to "the twelve certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary, called Magdalene, out of whom went seven devils."

The commentators give four explanations of her name; the most conclusive is that she belonged to the town of Magdala, and that she was so called to distinguish her from all other Marys, there being six in the New Testament. As she is credited with being the first witness of Jesus's resurrection, and by the Western church considered the same person as the Mary of Bethany, and the feast of St. Mary Magdalene was constructed on this assumption, she has become a most important modern as well as traditionary personage.

Luke does not inform us how seven devils came in Miss Mary, nor why they went out of her, but leaves us to conjecture that she and the other women probably were healed by Jesus; and as he tells us in the same chapter that Jesus, by their request, permitted a legion of devils (six thousand) to enter into two thousand swine (that is exactly three devils to a pig), we need not hesitate in believing Mark (xvi, 9) when he declares that Jesus appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils. It is to be regretted that Luke and Mark did not minutely describe the modus operandi, for it might have been as much more interesting than their account of the Gadarene demoniac, devilish-swine tragedy as was Mary Magdalene more valuable than a shote.

Moreover, it would have been most useful knowledge ever since to devil-believers, devil-sufferers, and devil miracle-workers to have possessed the secret of this wonderful power. Besides, it might have proved a lucrative means by which the officers of the church could have more readily filled the cofer-bags of the Lord's treasury.

It is inferred by the anointed ones that our heroine "had a demoniacal possession of more than ordinary malignity, since seven devils went out of her." But what is that small number compared to the six thousand that went out of the Gadarene demoniac into that drove of hogs? (The new version has it Gerasenes.) But as interesting as it might prove to pursue further this theme of devil-possession and devil-dispossession, we must nevertheless proceed to discuss the life and character of this "honored woman." It is said by Smith that "having had, in their most aggravated forms, some of the phenomena of mental and spiritual disease, . . in other demoniacs, . . from that state of misery she had been set free by the Healer, . . and found her safety and blessedness in following Him."

Be that as it may, this life of ministration brought numerous women into companionship, it seems, a few only of whom were known by name, and some of these not prominently till the crucifixion and resurrection.

It is not specified by any of the evangelists that either Martha or Mary, the sisters of Lazarus, were at the cross or sepulcher, though as Bethany was but two miles distant it is urged by some divines that they were probably present among the "many women looking on afar off," and perhaps at the tomb Sunday morning with the Marys to anoint the body of Jesuswith sweet spices, though their names are unmentioned.

It is very strange, as Smith admits, that "we have no record of their mode of life, or hopes or fears during the momentous days that preceded the crucifixion; they 'stood afar off' beholding these things during the closing agony on the cross." Thus ever is woman found hovering around, seeking to undo the diabolical deeds and to counteract the infernal influence of man, whether this account be true or false. All the evangelists agree in stating that Mary Magdalene was at the cross and sepulcher except Luke, who does not mention her name at the cross. Wonderful unanimity! Scarcely an agreement among them in any other one particular; but of that it is not our province here to speak.

In treating of Mary Magdalene other women associated with her in their ministrations and at the cross and sepulcher will be considered.

In this connection (Luke viii, 2, 3), among the many women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, besides Mary Magdalene only two are indicated by name, Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susanna. Joanna is mentioned only once afterward by Luke (xxiv, 10), where with the other women at the sepulcher the apostles are told that Jesus has risen. She "probably" had had some devil in her, little or big, and though the wife of the steward of Herod Antipas, who killed John the Baptist, and before whom Jesus was sent by Pilate, yet in her distress had risked an application to the "great physician," was healed, and joined in his "train." "What a train!" adds Brown, "and immortalized her name."

Of Susanna we know nothing except this one item, as she is never spoken of elsewhere.

In Matthew xxvii, 55, 56, we read that among the women that followed Jesus from Galilee ministering unto him was Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James and Joses, and the mother of Zebedee's children. The same group of women is described by Mark (xv, 40) as Mary Magdalene, Mary of James the Little and of Joses and Salome. Luke (xxiii, 49) mentions no names, only saying, "All his acquaintances and the women that followed him from Galilee stood afar off beholding these things." John's testimony is (xix, 25): "Now there stood by the cross of Jesus his mother and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas (commentaries and new revision say Clophas), and Mary Magdalene." Here we have all the names given of those standing at the cross, and "from a comparison of these passages," says Smith, "it appears that Mary of Clopas and Mary of James the Little and of Joses are the same person and that she was the sister of St. Mary the Virgin." Now comes the scramble to reconcile the inconsistencies evident in these passages. Smith makes a lame and tedious apology for "the fact of two sisters having the same name," and continues: "Mary of Clopas was probably the elder sister of the Lord's mother. It would seem that she had married Clopas or Alphaeus while her sister was still a girl. She had four sons, and at last three daughters. The names of the daughters are unknown to us; those of the sons are James, Joses, Jude, Simon, two of whom became enrolled among the twelve apostles (James), and a third (Simon) may have succeeded his brother in the charge of the church of Jerusalem. Of Joses and the daughters we know nothing. Mary herself is brought before us for the first time on the day of the crucifixion, in the parallel passages already quoted from St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John." Under the head of "James," he goes into a long disquisition to ascertain whether these sons and daughters are really the children of Mary the wife of Clopas or the children of the virgin, mentioned by Matthew xiii, 55, thus: "Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? And his brethren, James and Joses and Simon and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us? Whence then hath this man these things?" This is as plain as language can make it that these sons and daughters were the children of the virgin, and brothers and sisters of the god Jesus, not his cousins. Smith confesses that "there are difficulties in the way" of some ten or more conjectures, hypotheses, and conclusions arrived at by different expositors, which he analyzes, for if as stated by the evangelists, he says:

"First, it introduces two sets of four first cousins, bearing the same names of James, Joses, Jude, and Simon, and secondly, it drives us to take our choice between three doubtful and improbable hypotheses as to the parentage of this second set of James, Joses, Jude, and Simon. There are three such hypotheses: (a) The eastern hypothesis, that they were the children of Joseph by a former wife. (b) The Helvidian hypothesis, that James, Joses, Jude, Simon, and the three sisters were children of Joseph and Mary. (c) The Levirate hypothesis, that Joseph and Clopas were brothers, and that Joseph raised up seed to his dead brother." After bringing in all his evidence he sums up under "six objections" to his own hypothesis and the hypotheses of others, some of which we must quote: "It certainly would be natural to think that we had here but one family of four brothers and three or more sisters, the children of Clopas and Mary, nephews and nieces of the Virgin Mary. There are difficulties, however, in the way of this conclusion. For, 1. The four brethren in Matthew are described as the brothers of Jesus, not as his cousins; 2. They are found living as at their home with the Virgin Mary, which seems unnatural if she was their aunt, their mother being, as we know, still alive . . The four brothers and their sisters are always found living and moving about with the Virgin Mary. If they were the children of Clopas the Virgin Mary was their aunt. Her own husband would appear without doubt to have died at some time between A.D. 8 and A.D. 26. Clopas or Alphaeus is not mentioned at all, except as designating Mary and James. Nor have we any reason for believing him to have been alive during our Lord's ministry. What difficulty is there in supposing that the two widowed sisters should have lived together, the more so as one of them had but one son, and he was often taken from her by his ministerial duties?" And so you see, after all their "hypotheses," "supposings," and "objections," they leave the subject where they began it, not knowing whether Jesus was the one Holy Ghost son of Mary, and these other four sons and daughters his half brothers and sisters the children of Mary and Joseph, or whether they were his cousins and the children of his mother's sister (the other Mary), who was his aunt, by her husband, Clopas or Alphaeus. And they are not half done yet; but we will no longer burden you with their suppositions on this topic, for he can never discover through them nor their infallible word whether Mary was the mother of those four boys, and he didn't know how many girls, or whether they belonged to her sister, the other Mary, and Clopas or Alphaeus. Is it not strange that scholars will regard as authority a record that compels such a wide range of doubt, conjecture, admission, opinion, and conclusion? And now comes the precious revision, giving broader scope than ever to diversity of views toward harmonizing the one true revelation, and uniting all mankind in one grand universal millennium of evangelical Christianity to sail on in one "Great Eastern," to one eternal heaven of bliss, world without end. Amen.

But we must hasten to "the mother of Zebedee's children," as Salome is usually designated. Conundrum—Who was the father of Zebedee's children? Do you suppose those learned divines can tell? If so, they had better leave off ruminating over the fatherhood of Jesus and the parentage of these boys, call those conundrums unsolvable, and let them pass.

Well, Salome is mentioned only twice by name, at the cross and sepulcher. Smith says: "It is the opinion of many modern critics that she was the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus. (John xix, 25.) . . The words admit, however, of another and hitherto generally-received explanation. . . . We can hardly regard the point as settled, though the weight of modern criticism is decidedly in favor of the former view." And yet on such points for opinion's sake have good men and women been tortured, roasted alive, and given to wild beasts, and but for the march of intellect, free speech, free thought, and free press to-day, would the ungodly woman be ostracised, indicted, and perhaps killed for writing this; Mr. Bennett imprisoned or burnt alive for publishing it; and yourselves for reading it be put upon the rack or thrust into loathsome dungeons, and all for believing or not believing some of those opinions upon which these learned rabbis cannot decide! What a weight of misery has the blood-thirsty church of Christ loaded upon helpless humanity in its zeal, bigotry, and ignorant pretensions of assumed divine rights and power to do God's work for him on earth in order to assist man to get to him in heaven, behold his face, and sit down in the kingdom with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the blood-washed throng, to go no more out from his presence forever and ever. Mercy, mercy, deliver me! The ungodly woman here enters her protest and puts it on record that she not only does not desire a residence in this kingdom and a seat at the right hand of God, but that she will use all the effort in her power to prevent herself being carried or dragged to such a seven-by-nine aristocratic, blood-bought inheritance as this New Jerusalem is promised to be.

But we must return to Salome, who, if the record is true, was not of the last opinion of the ungodly woman, for we read (Matt. xx, 20) that she preferred a request to Jesus on behalf of her two sons for seats of honor in this kingdom that the ungodly woman refuses and would shun as a moral pest-house or mental bastile. She must have been a bold, ambitious, and selfish woman to have desired the monopolization of the two highest seats for her two sons to the exclusion of the ten other disciples—a pretty good indication that if she did not follow Jesus for the loaves and fishes, she did at least expect an exalted position for her boys, the story evidently disclosing the expectation that Jesus, like an earthly monarch, would be hoisted on high with his fawning, cringing courtiers around him in obeisance, and that seats at his immediate right and left hands would exalt as premiers her sons over the other disciples and his subjects. We might "conjecture" in view of this "hypothesis" that this vain mother, though a fisherman's wife, on court occasions hoped to be able to say, with a wink of her eye and a toss of her head, to the less favored dames surrounding her in the galleries, "See, there are my two sons James and John sitting the one on the right hand and the other on the left of King Jesus!" But this fond, doting, proud mother was doomed to disappointment. Though she came to the "king of the Jews" with her sons, "worshiping him" like other office-seekers, asking for the best places for her boys, instead of preference she got a most ungracious snubbing, while the ten disciples were very indignant against the two brethren, "probably" supposing that it was "a put-up job" by Jim and John to have this "certain thing" asked of Jesus by their mother. This being so, and the fisherman Zebedee also in the secret, poor Salome deserves our pity and compassion for being thrust forward as spokesman for and by the male members of the family and thus humiliated when she asked nothing for herself and all for others. So we will take back all before said against her, for she might have been an unwilling slave and beggar instead of a vain suppliant. "Barnum's happy family" was never exemplified in Jesus's disciples, for they were always picking quarrels with one another.

Now that we have the recorded knowledge gathered in of the associates of Mary Magdalene, we will proceed with her history in connection with these other women. Their presence at the cross and sepulcher is so well known that we will not dilate upon the occurrences. (See Matt. xxviii, 1–11; Mark xvi, 1–11; Luke xxiv, 1–12, 22; John xx, 1–19.)

All endeavors of the learned expositors to clear up the contradictory account of Mary Magdalene's part at the sepulcher avail nothing! Brown overflows with "gush," among which, in speaking of the visit of the women "when it was yet dark," he says, "Not an hour, it would seem, was lost by those dear lovers of the Lord Jesus;" yea, brags that his "virgin mother" was "not" the first to greet the risen savior, but that these "dear lovers" of his were early at the tomb, and that to Mary Magdalene especially was given this honor.

But we will let him give it in his own words: "Dear disciple, thy dead Lord is to thee 'the Lord' still. These particulars have a singular air of artless truth about them. Mary, in her grief, runs to the two apostles who were soon to be so closely associated in proclaiming the savior's resurrection, they, followed by Mary, hasten to see with their own eyes. . . . Mary, arriving perhaps by another direction, lingers at the spot weeping for her missing Lord. As she gazes through her tears on the open tomb she also ventures to stoop down and look into it, when lo! 'two angels in white,' as from the world of light, appear to her in a 'sitting' posture, 'as having finished some business and awaiting some one to impart tidings to' (Bengal). . . . But she is in tears, and these suit not so glorious an exit. They (the angels) are going to point out to her the incongruity. You would think the vision too much for a lone woman. . . . Can I choose but weep when they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him? On this she turned herself and saw Jesus standing beside her, but took him for the gardener. Clad, therefore, in some such style he must have been. But if they ask, as too curious interpreters do, whence he got those habiliments, we answer (with Olshausen and Luthard), where the two angels got theirs. [What a logical answer! See poem, Easter Sunday, by T. M. W., alias the Ungodly Woman, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 2d.] Nor did the voice of his first words discover him, 'Woman, why weepest thou? Whom seekest thou?' He will try her ere he tell her. . . . 'Sir, if thou have borne him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away.' Wilt thou, dear, fragile woman? [Cant, pure cant.] But it is the voice of sublime affection that thinks itself fit for anything if once in possession of its object. Like Joseph, he can no longer restrain himself. 'Jesus saith unto her, Mary.' It is the oft-repeated name, uttered, no doubt, with all the wonted manner, and bringing a rush of unutterable and overpowering associations with it. 'She turned herself and saith to him, Babboni.' But that single word of transported recognition was not enough for woman's full heart. Not knowing the change which had passed upon him, she hastens to express by her action what words failed to clothe [going to kiss him, probably], but she is checked. 'Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not, for I am not ascended to my father. Old familiarities must now give place to new and more awful yet sweeter approaches. This seems the spirit, at least, of these mysterious words, on which much difference of opinion has obtained, and not much that is satisfactory said."

And who wonders, when we read in Matt. xxviii, 9, they came and held him by the feet and worshiped? In view of which Brown says, in commenting on that chapter, "How truly womanly!" and that, too, after having penned the preceding, to which he added, "for these sweeter approaches the time has not come yet." Touches, Jesus doubtless meant, such as anointings, kisses, etc. How they could touch him not, and yet hold him by the feet, is one of the great mysteries of godliness that these godly men have not made plain to themselves, it appears, any more than they have to the ungodly woman.

Columns of criticisms could be penned upon this short extract, but cannot the intelligent reader discover the points and make the applications himself? One, however, must not be omitted. Jesus was so nearly appareled like the gardener that Mary, supposing him to be the same, addressed him as such and had quite a conversation before she discovered her mistake. Rather a poor materialization, spirit cabinet dupes would consider nowadays. Perhaps the medium was dressed in the gardener's clothes, since there was such a close resemblance. Such feats have been performed in modern times, alas! alas!

Smith accounts for Mary's blunder thus, "The utter stupor of grief is shown in her want of power to recognize at first either the voice or the form of the Lord to whom she had ministered." But he was in the gardener's clothes or an angel's, and Mary could not be expected to know him thus transmogrified. Skeptics can find as many objections and as much to ridicule in the idea of this resurrection as can Christians against modern spirit materializations in the nineteenth century.

How about Mark? Instead of having two angels, he describes a young man in the sepulcher clothed in a long white garment! Brown says, "In Matthew he is called the 'angel of the Lord,' but here he is described as he appeared to the eye, in the form of a life that knows no decay." Spiritualists can find proofs, aid, and comfort both in the Old Testament and New that Bible worshipers can neither gainsay nor resist.

Permit us to quote from Smith, under "Mary Magdalene," a refutation of the belief that she and "the sinner" are identical. It might have been placed in the anointings in the last chapter, but was overlooked. "Out of these few facts there rise a multitude of wild conjectures, and with these there has been constructed a whole romance of hagiology. The questions that meet us connect themselves with the narratives in the four gospels of women who came with precious ointment to anoint the feet or the head of Jesus. Although the opinion seems to have been at one time maintained, few would now hold that Matt. xxvi and Mark xvi are reports of two distinct events.

The supposition that there were three anointings has found favor with Origen and Lightfoot. We are left to the conclusion adopted by the great majority of interpreters that the gospels record two anointings —one in some city unnamed during our Lord's Galilean ministry (Luke vii), the other at Bethany, before the last entry into Jerusalem. We come, then, to the question whether in these two narratives we meet with one woman or two. The one passage adduced for the former conclusion is John xi, 2. There is but slender evidence for the assumption that the two anointings were the acts of one and the same woman and that woman the sister of Lazarus. There is, if possible, still less for the identification of Mary Magdalene with the chief actor in either history. 1. When her name appears in Luke viii, 3, there is not one word to connect it with the history that immediately precedes; 2. The belief that Mary of Bethany and Mary Magdalene are identical is yet more startling. Not one single circumstance except reverence for their master is common. No one evangelist gives the slightest hint of identity. Nor is this lack of evidence in the New Testament itself compensated by any such weight of authority as would indicate a really trustworthy tradition. Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian say nothing to imply that they accept it. The language of Irenæus is against it. Origen discusses the question fully and rejects it. He is followed by the whole succession of the expositors of the Eastern church. In the Western church, however, the other belief began to spread. The translators under James I. adopted the received tradition. Since that period there has been a gradually accumulating consensus against it.

These extracts serve a double purpose. First, to show the wrangle of the churches and the diversity of opinion maintained, all in the name of God, and how utterly impossible it is to arrive at anything like truth among such a mass of contradictions. Second, in quotations from the Bible and extracts from commentaries there is learned the actual statements of both or the facts set forth by each on the topics treated, so we trust our readers will not consider space and time misappropriated by publication and perusal. For instance, the sacred expounders are not willing to have it believed that Mary of Bethany, whom Jesus loved, was identical with "the sinner" who washed Jesus feet, or yet that Mary Magdalene and the latter were the same, or farther that she and Mary of Bethany were the same, therefore they strain a point and endeavor to make impossibilities appear facts, and so in thousands of instances that might be adduced.

One great lesson to be learned from these women following and "ministering unto Jesus of their substance" is the application made by the priests and clergy of modern times. Brown says on these dispossessed women: "He had the double claim of having brought healing to their bodies and new life to their souls. Drawn to him by an attraction more than magnetic, they accompany him on this tour as his almoners—ministering unto him of their substance. Blessed Savior! It melts us to see thee living upon the love of thy ransomed people. That they bring thee their poor offerings we wonder not. Thou hast sown unto them spiritual things, and they think it, as well they might, a small thing that thou shouldst reap their carnal things. 'Oh, the debt of the riches' of this poverty of his. He who was the support of the spiritual life of his people disdained not to be supported by them in the body. He was not ashamed to penetrate so far into the depths of poverty as to live upon the alms of love. He fed others miraculously," etc.

Is not here portrayed in living characters, better even than the pen of a Paine or the eloquence of an Ingersoll can depict, the true theory of the church and clergy subsisting upon the people, especially women ministering of their substance unto the Lord, and "the Lord" is the lazy, useless, mendicant clergy, who, like a swarm of locusts, infest the country, eating up every green thing or all vegetation?

Is it not always made to appear that the spiritual care over the souls of men is far more than an equivalent for all the temporal goods that can be bestowed in return? Does it not "melt" the fat priests and high salaried ministers "to see" and feel themselves "living upon the love of their people?" How their hearts warm at the anniversaries and donation parties when the healed sisters bring in "their poor offerings," though the dear people may live on bread and water in sacrifice and self-denial! "Blessed savior!" is equivalent to "blessed minister!" "It would be none too good for Dr. Payson if it was all 'lasses," said an old lady when tipping up the jug and pouring a plentiful supply into the doctor's tea as a substitute for sugar, when remonstrated with by him to desist as there was "enough, enough, more than enough, my good woman!" (In my adopted town, Rindge, N. H., this is said to have actually occurred, the settled minister, Seth Payson, being the father of the renowned Edward Payson, D.D., of Portland, Me.)

And so all over the world, "nothing is too good for the minister," and those who are not blessed with an abundance of the goody-goodies are expected to make up in quantity what they lack in quality, like the old woman who thought the absence of sugar required more molasses for Dr. Payson's tea. "Dear women, ministering to Jesus in his glorious missionary tours!" and "poor offerings," are made the synonyms to-day of "Dear sisters, how much they have done and are doing for the church, the Lord's Zion!" while these poor deluded women who steal from their families in order to support a lazy ministry are flattering themselves that their "poor offerings" are in the Lord's treasury as purchase-money for a passport to heaven! O folly, fanaticism, and idol-man worship, when will ye cease in this fair world? When will woman throw off this incubus of superstition and no longer weigh herself down and curse her offspring with faith in such frauds, but open her eyes and use her reason in religious matters the same as she would in household duties and the ordinary affairs of life?

Punch-and-Judy Show or Seance, Which?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir:

W. F. Jamieson, in defending himself through your issue of June 18th against the charge of dishonesty in coming out a Materialist after having been a Spiritualist, says, "You may be a little surprised (in view of the repeated falsifications of my teachings through Spiritual publications) when I tell you that never in my whole life hav I charged fraud upon any medium without positiv proof."

Mr. Jamieson, in announcing himself through THE TRUTH SEEKER a Materialist, characterized the manifestations which occur in the presence of J. H. Mott, of this place, as a "Punch-and-Judy show," and said he had witnessed them. I hav not his manifesto before me, but think he referred to no other phenomena as having convinced him of the fraudulent character of Spiritualism.

Now I would like to lay before your readers, as I did immediately after his insinuations above referred to, the facts of the case.

He never attended but one of Mott's seances. He sat on the side of the room opposit the cabinet; and when called by a spirit he advanced to within some three feet of the aperture, when the spirit parted the curtains, and Mr. Jamieson remarked, "That looks like my mother," and immediately turned on his heel and went to his seat without the least attempt at investigation; and it is no wonder that he was not again called. Whatever spirit it may hav been was anxious to converse with him, but no doubt took in the situation, which I infer was that he was not an honest investigator—did not want to know the whole truth. This I say after attending nearly three hundred seances.

When Mr. Jamieson left for his hotel, Mrs. Mott invited him to return and investigate free of cost. But he left town next day.

Mr. Jamieson did not charge fraud on Mott in plain terms, but insinuated it, which he justly pronounces "meaner yet" in the article I am criticising.

STEPHEN YOUNG.

Memphis, Mo., July 1, 1881.

An Appeal

From the Black Hills Liberal League to all reform organizations throughout the United States, to unite and form a new political party to supplant the Republican and Democratic parties in the control and administration of this government. Whereas, neither of the two great political parties above named are longer fit to control the affairs of this nation, for reasons which are obvious to all honest men, and whereas, combined action alone on the part of all reformers can oust them from power, now therefore be it resolved that a national convention should be held at an early day, composed of delegates from all reform organizations, for the purpose of ascertaining what issues can be agreed upon which will enlist the sympathies and coöperation of a sufficient number to sweep from existence both these corrupt parties, and inaugurate a just and pure government administered in the interest of the whole people.

Resolved, that we make this application in view of a bona fide accomplishment of the objects set forth, and fully believe that the time for such action has arrived.

D. P. WILCOX, Pres.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find $10—$5 for the trip round the world, $3 for renewal of subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $2 for luxuries on the trip. Wishing you a pleasant journey and safe return, I am ever your friend and admirer of the cause you are so fearlessly contending for, T. G. HOGUE.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., May 31, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Please find below an order for five dollars to make good my pledge to help you make a journey round the world. I wish you good luck everywhere you go, and hope your health will never be failing. Before you start off please send me your photograph, so that I may always hav you before my eyes during your recitals in your books, and that I may share alike the good and bad hours which are before you. With my best wishes for your noble enterprise, I remain, HENRY FUCHS.

OTTAWA, KAN., May 13, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Enclosed please find money order for $5.00, to help you on that long journey. I sent it as soon as I could after seeing the notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope it will be in time. May the journey be both pleasant and profitable to you and all concerned, and be assured we shall be happier at your coming than at your going.

Fraternally thine, SALEM FOUTS.

BROOKLYN, July 15, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: In my retired life I did not know of the existence of your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, but since I received a few of your last numbers I was so delighted that I almost regret your next journey. It will be a loss to the future pages, but that will no doubt be compensated for by the contents of the two volumes descriptiv of the trip around the world, for which I subscribe $5.00, which you will please find enclosed.

Yours truly, A. SNIDER DE PELLEGRINI.

TOLEDO, OHIO, July 8, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed please find my $5 for the trip round the world. Whenever I saw the many shares taken I felt uneasy that I, one of the oldest of your subscribers, could not hav my name added to the list of your admirers, but I could not spare the money. I shall feel more satisfied and easier now. With my best wishes for a pleasant trip, and a safe return, I remain, your admirer,

F. HILLENKAMP.

WHITE BLUFF, TENN., June 15, 1881.

BROTHER BENNETT: I hav not been in favor of your taking that long trip round the world; somehow I don't feel exactly right about it. I want you to hav the honor and pleasure, but not the danger. Shall feel most glad when you get home safe and sound. I hav subscribed nothing for the trip in hopes that you would not go, but find you are bound to go, so inclosed please find $5 to spend on the journey. Perhaps you will want to go into Adam's old beer garden and menagerie, which I understand is run by a very worthy Dutchman and Yankee. My last order of books came to hand all right. "Semitic Gods" is splendid. So much for so little money; I don't see how it is done. Yours truly, S. P. JONES.

PEDEE, WIS., July 11, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed is $5, my mite to the round the-world fund. You may need it, and I want the book. At first I did not like, and do not now really like, the idea of a person of your age who is much needed at home to make a trip round this old earth. Hope you may hav a good time, return home with renewed vigor, so that you can, through THE TRUTH SEEKER (the best Freethought paper in America), giv us the folly and superstition of the old Jew book and so-called Christian churches as keen and sharp as ever, if not better. Perhaps you may learn by the way. Yours most truly, DANIEL PROBST.

COLON, MICH., July 12, 1881.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find my draft for $5 to help you on your way around the world. Go, my dear friend, and do the thorough work for humanity. And after you have safely returned to your good wife I hope you will make a tour of the states, and so giv your hosts of friends an opportunity to take you by the hand and say, "Well done, good and faithful servant. Abide in the love and esteem of all truth seekers." Good-bye, and may all good influences keep, guide, and protect you. A. J. KINNE, M.D.

[We now think that after we return from the other side of the globe we shall comply with the wish of many friends, and visit numerous points in our own country, and will be pleased to call on friend Kinne and others in his locality.—ED. T. S.]

READING, PA., July 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find inclosed $5 to help you circumnavigate Herr Gott's footstool. If you come across that exceeding high mountain where Christ and and his uncle, Mr. Splitfoot, went up to get a good view of the opposit side of the globe, I would be much obliged if you would procure me a fragment of rock from the highest peak, for I hav no specimens from such an altitude in my collection of minerals. It would be nice to show to our Christian gospel-grinders. It might strengthen them in their faith in the old mountain and fish stories. When I was young I began to read the old book to get pious, but was unable to get that far. When I came to the big fish, mountain, ark-Noah tales, and the wet season it took to get Captain Noah's little box afloat, I found them a little too much to swallow. But most of the people are used to swallowing, so Noah and his ark, the big fish, the Bible, and all that comes out of the gospel-grinders' mouths goes down readily, and they ask for more. But the good Bible converted me from Christianity to unbelief, or Infidelity, as my Christian friends and some of the gospel-grinders say. I wish you good health and a happy journey and safe return to you happy home again.

Yours for truth and liberty, H. W. HOLLENBERGH.

ALBANY, N. Y., June 24, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Although I hav not made any pledge, I am happy to send you a money order for $5 toward your intended trip round the globe. I hav no doubt but it will be a good investment, judging by your letters to Mr. Mair. If that gentleman were in Albany he would no longer doubt if there was anyone that believed in a personal God. I listened to a sermon by a divine of this city, who stated that he would go to heaven just as we are now, with the stomach and bowels left out, as there would be no further need for them, and being made in God's image, we must of course hav the same shape. Some of the pictures in Puck remind me of the redeemed, as explained by our reverend.

If it is not too much trouble, and you should happen to come to Nineveh, please find the hotel (in the whale) where Jonah took lodging for three days and three nights, and was thrown on dry land for not paying his board. I hav no doubt but the fish we notice on some church steeples are in memory of Jonah's tavern.

Perhaps I ask too much, but if you can inquire in Bethany where Lazarus died the second time, and if there was word left not to call him back again from that happy shore, where (according to priests) it is so much better than here below, I should like to know. He did not thank Jesus for it that I know of, and was so angry that he would not tell anything about the golden streets. The same has been the case with all the saints that were raised by a miracle, no information about Abraham's bosom, the great white throne, or anything of that kind, not even the man whom the bones belong to that touched the prophets would open his mouth on the subject of a blessed immortality. Abraham's bosom is indeed a very tempting place to be, judging by some pictures I hav seen of him; but then if the ministers could not make any one sing "I want to be an angel," what would be the use of their preaching? They would hav to learn a trade, but a great deal rather work for Jesus than for a carpenter's boss, and they hav a good reason.

I hope your pledged friends will not cause you to postpone your trip on their account, but will hasten to send their "V." My husband and I wish you a happy journey and a safe return, plenty of money, and good health, and hope that you will giv some of your tracts to the missionaries.

Yours truly, MRS. H. A. WEENINK-ILOHAN.

ELGIN, ILLINOIS, July 10, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Much as we shall miss you at the helm of the glorious TRUTH SEEKER to guide it through the many breakers in the way to mental liberty, we must bow to the decrees of fate, which now seem to say, "Go ye into all the world, preaching the gospel of truth." My benediction would be, May the elements of nature, assisted by the art of man, guide you in safety through all your outgoings and incomings back once more to your own sanctum sanctorum with renewed energy to battle for years to come the superstitions of the age. By the bye, to make sure of plenty of the cause of the root of all evil for your estimable wife, and to set the paper on a sure foundation, spend some of the "V's" in good fat life insurance policies, for there is no telling what pranks Satan may put some brother Anthony up to in your trip round this lump of mud, for Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do. You will miss one great unnatural curiosity if you don't call on ex-President Hayes in your travels. Try, if possible, to get a small piece—if it should be no more than the small toe—of sister Lot. You had better send some of the nativs to get it for you, for I suppose there is an angel watching the old salt with a two-edged sword. Hoping the inclosed draft for $5 will be a help to you on the way, I remain your friend and well-wisher, J. W. ARCHIBALD.

ITHACA, N. Y., July 12, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER (which I prize very much) that you are about to journey round the world, and will publish in book form all interesting observations for the benefit of its readers. If you succeed, I wish to obtain all the information those books contain, and for that purpose please accept money order for $5.

I hope your wife is in agreement with your great undertaking. Forty years ago, when I was a strong orthodox, the faith and worship of Jesus naturally detached from me the appreciation of the advice in any affair of importance of my slavish wife. But when I come to repudiate the increasing worship of Jesus that wife-slave rose in importance immediately, and now she is truly a helpmeet. Why? Because the dues I had taken from her and given to another I returned to her, and it has ever since increasingly seemed to me that a man without a woman's kind sympathy and loving influence is only half a man; and if there is anything in nature that I worship more than another it certainly is woman. According to orthodox history, she was the last of creation, and was not made of dust, but was taken from man's side. However that may be, she has ever since been an alien from him and a slave to him. But, a glorious thought, she is fast returning once more whence she was taken. Hallelujah! These twain will soon become one flesh again. This world will soon come to appreciate woman as being fully equal with man in all respects, when she is emancipated and put in possession of all the privileges of man. What so beautiful in all nature, both in form, action, and sympathy, as a virtuous woman? She is man's ideal, and worthy of worship.

A little more and I hav done. A writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 9th, says, "I am aware that many of your readers do not believe in continued conscious life after what we call death takes place." I reply that we never hav had any reliable evidence that the mind does not die when the body dies. It came in a very small degree at our birth, and was developed in our growth to manhood. We hav been educated from children to believe that it existed after death, but it is a self-conceited fancy that we desire to be so. I hav been a strong believer in the hereafter existence myself, but come to examin the evidence I find none, except we liv in our posterity. One generation succeeds another eternally and that progressivly. Yours truly, ZENOS KENT.

ST. JOHNS, MICH.

FRIEND BENNETT: It is absolutely necessary that in your TRUTH SEEKER you keep the facts before the people that the prophet Jeremiah was chief prophet of the captivity around whom all the rest of the prophets circled, and their burden was concerning Israel, to whom were enjoined the endearing names as follows, Son of God, God's Servant, God's Vinyard, Divorced Widow, Lamb of the Slaughter, Vesture Dipped in Blood, Saints, Clouds of Heaven, Priest after the Order of Melchesedek—all these so shamefully crowded upon the unknown refugee Jesus Christ. GEO. R. BENNETT.

ZAHNVILLE, KAN., June 18, 1881.

MR. BENNETT: Ho! for a waltz around the world to view the debris which time has made of the works of of man. I feel your books descriptiv of your travels will meet a want not yet filled. Do not fail to note the peculiarities of the common people, and of their religions. I know you will look after them. You may count me as a subscriber for your book, but am not able just now to forward the money.

Ours is a glorious cause to free poor superstitious humanity from the gigantic frauds of priests and the pope. The reign of King Jehovah must hav an end. Man must learn that he is solely a product of the earth, which, through the reign of law, was condensed from nebulous matter, aye, from the infinit, gaseous ocean that fills boundless space, and is not accountable to gods or priests, but is just what the force of circumstance has made him; and that pain is his greatest benefactor, in fact, his guardian angel, that warns him to stop, look for danger, not of the wrath of God, but that he in his ignorance has trespassed upon his physical nature. Yours is a noble work. Keep pounding away with your mighty iconoclastic hammer until the last god, devil, hell, heaven, god-houses, joss-houses, idols, Bibles, Korans, Zend Avestas, Shastas, books of Brahma, etc., shall all be pounded into dust. That shall not bring forth false religions, but something tangible.

May your travels round the world be like the rings of Saturn, a belt of light, that shall in the fast rolling ages of the future illuminate the pathway of the millions yet unborn. THE TRUTH SEEKER and Colonel Ingersoll will soon demolish the ponderous car of Juggernaut, the church, in this country. But the citizens of of the rest of the world, with their medicin men, priests, and Mumbo Jumbo, will need a thousand years to reach them. Let the old planet spin round. Truth shall yet make man free.

Yours as ever, D. C. SEYMOUR.

LAWRENCE, MASS., May 16, 1881.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 7th that you are going to take a trip around this little globe, and I think you will find it a hard road to travel, as well as a long road, but I do not wish to discourage you in your undertaking. I see every week the many letters encouraging you to go, and some counseling to stay at home. But if my prayers will do you any good while going around the world, you shall hav hundreds of them—prayers that you may hav a pleasant journey and arrive safe at your dear home again. I wish you could hav some trusty friend accompany you, which would make it more pleasant for you, as you would feel more safe in some of those heathen countries. Well, I suppose that the Sneak will look sharp for your letters, and will perhaps not let them go through the mails, any more than he would "The Bible Abridged." I wrote two or three times about one year ago to hav "The Bible Abridged" sent me, and hav never received a copy yet. I would like about six copies, if they could come safe by mail.

I think Mr. Mair is doing wisely in trying to answer your letters in so few lines. I think that after you hav sent your reply to his short letter he will be under the necessity of asking his merciful God to help him excuse some of his God's follies that are written in his God Almighty's holy Bible. I think Mr. Mair is a smart man to keep up as well as he does, considering what a hard row he has to hoe every time, but he must know that he can't hold out much longer and hoe his row decent. The Bible is a very bad book to get along with when you use reason and common sense, as it is full of contradictions, absurdities, and lies from one end to the other. But it givs a very fluent history of gods, devils, kings, beasts, adulterers, murderers, liars, and drunkards as sample copies of an all-wise being, which examples I am afraid too many of our Christian believers follow. Yours, BENJAMIN GRIFFIN.

GALENA, MO., June 11, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav just read, with great amusement, your "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," and now I want a specimen copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I want to subscribe for the best Infidel paper I can find. Yours truly, HAROLD FISK.

PATERSON, N. J., June 20, 1881.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that the Paterson Liberal League within the last six weeks has had a series of lectures delivered by Mr. S. P. Putnam, of New York, which hav been received with great favor by all who hav heard them, and one of our members told me that "they surpassed anything he had ever before heard or read," and he is a Freethinker of long standing. He also said that "for beauty of style and comprehensivness, in his opinion they are unequaled." It affords me great pleasure to conscientiously indorse Mr. Putnam's lectures as having great merit in helping on the great work of reform which Liberals hav laid out to do, and to say to Liberals everywhere that he himself is a gentleman in every sense, genial and sociable with all, and when the lecture season commences in the fall they can do no better than engage him for a course of lectures. I will also add, that I honestly believe that he is an earnest, hard-working Liberal who is intensely anxious for the success of our cause, and all Liberal Leagues that can possibly do so should engage him forthwith. They will never regret doing so.

Wishing you a very pleasant journey round the world, and that you will return safe to us with added strength and knowledge, I beg to remain one of your well wishers, J. WARR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 15, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please place the inclosed $1 to to my credit on THE TRUTH SEEKER subscription. Would send you more, but being a working man with a family, am obliged to eke out the wherewith in small instalments. Am very sorry that your foreign trip will necessitate the abridgment and close of your discussion with Mr. Mair, as I hav been much interested in your letters, and was in hopes that every proposition as marked down would be thoroughly discussed. Your last two or three letters particularly are "hard hits" on the old God of theology and the Bible, and were they to be read by Christians generally over the country, would soon, as I believe, depopulate the churches. If you do encircle the planet, as it now seems likely you will, I would suggest that you do Palestine in particular, the old country of the Jews and their bloodthirsty deity. Your friend, WM. H. WHITE.

PRINCETON, KY., May 23, 1881.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Through the kindness of Mr. J. E. Brace, Carrollton, Illinois, I now enjoy the privilege of reading, each week, your interesting paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, through whom I became acquainted with the paper last year.

I notice your proposition to repair the Paine monument at New Rochelle, and one to which I take great pleasure in contributing my mite. The monument should not only be repaired, but also protected from further destruction by the hand of the despoiler, not that the shaft is essential to perpetuate his memory, but more to demonstrate our appreciation of the hero of the Revolution, author of the Declaration of Independence, and the advocate of Freethought. I approve of your suggestion in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 12th that a fine monument should be erected to the memory of Paine in the city of New York (Boston having Paine Memorial Hall), and I believe when the time comes there will be thousands of Liberals to whom Paine's memory is so dear that they will respond with such generosity as to insure the success of the work. I hav enjoyed your replies to Mair's letters, and the Besant-Hatchard debate. While Princeton is a very pleasant town, it is strictly orthodox. Three or four will number all who dare think for themselvs. The names of Paine, Volney, and Voltaire are unknown, except when shamefully defamed from the pulpit, as they often are. I inclose $2.50—$1 for the Paine-Monument Fund, and $1.50 for the "Infidel Abroad," which please forward to Yours respectfully, O. P. ELDRED.

BOZEMAN, MON. TER., May 17, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: As some time has passed since you heard from me, or since I hav contributed anything material to you and the cause, you may think that I hav gone and joined the Mormons or the Methodists, but I hav not. That you may know this is not the case, I hav thought it best to write a word or two.

I hav not canvassed for the paper recently, as I was so occupied with different avocations that no time was left for either canvassing or reading. Next fall, when winter draws near and the evenings are long, I shall make solicitations for THE TRUTH SEEKER a specialty. You hav now on your list of subscribers the name of J. V. Bogert. This was brought about by my placing in his hands the numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing the Besant-Hatchard Debate. He is wonderfully pleased with the paper, and I am glad that he is. He is an educated man, and receiver of our land office. It is through him that I am trying to get a League established in Bozeman. I reside so far from there that it is little I can do, save in this way: A few days since I placed in his hands a copy of the Comstock laws, and also the Proceedings of the Liberal Convention held at Chicago last fall, and other papers sent me, I think, by Leland. Some time since there was talk in Bozeman of organizing a League, but their minds seemed to lean toward Ingersoll. I placed said documents in Bogert's hands to counteract such a movement. Bogert thinks that you certainly are one of the most thoroughly read men in the United States. He says that it does not seem conceivable that a man's mind can contain so much. This is inference drawn from your debate with G. M. Mair. When Bogert came here he was a member of the Episcopal church, but skepticism camped on his trail and overwhelmed him. This is one of the best countries in the world for poor priest-ridden whelps. I hav known several who came here, and soon after their arrival the scales fell from their eyes, and it would surprise you to see how sensible they became. I asked one how it happened that he had made such a change. He answered that I had talked so darned much to him that he could not help it. Preachers don't look near so sleek and fat here as in the states. It is the next thing to starvation for those of the country-schoolhouse stamp. They hav turned this immediate vicinity over to the devil. One called around to convert me the other day, but he went off on three legs, and was honest enough when gone to acknowledge that he had caught a Tartar. Pardon this nonsense, and accept many thanks for your book present. I accept it as a gratuitous gift, not as compensation for what I did for the cause. I hav laid it by for reference, and like it very much.

I learn from THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 7th that you are to make a trip round the world. In giving the names of the donors I notice that mine is left out. However, you will need all the money you can get. I shall send mine along all the same.

Since writing the above I received your letter. In obedience to your request, I shall do what I can to find donors to your tour, but fear that it will be with poor success, as at this time of the year here people's minds are engaged otherwise. I wish you immeasurable success, and my best wishes shall attend you throughout your long trip. Ever your friend,

THOMAS BURK.

ANGOLA, IND., May 14, 1881.

BRO. BENNETT: Inclosed is postal order for another year, from 20th June, the time paid for, for the best paper in the world. Myself and family take three papers and periodicals, but first of all we read THE TRUTH SEEKER. I see you are bound to go around the globe; I had hoped that you would abandon that idea, but your friends seem determined to send you. I know very well that the vivid description of your travels will be exceedingly interesting, as were your letters from Europe last season, but there is so much at home for reformers to do and so few as well-qualified as yourself to do it, I therefore regret your going, but if you go I shall want your book of travels. The "Gods and Religions," as far as I hav read it is very interesting, and every reformer, and indeed every Christian should hav it in his library for historical reference. When the Christians got you in the prison at Albany they thought they had achieved much. Comstock boasted that it was the best thing he had done during the year; they little thought that you would write during your imprisonment two volumes of 1,900 pages, the most damaging to their Christian system of any book extant. I must say, Bro. Bennett, take special care of your health, do not expose yourself to those disease-producing influences more than cannot be avoided, for you, like myself, are near the end of the journey of life. I am almost 61 years old and health not very good. Yours with respect,

DR. J. H. MOORE.

NORSE, TEX., May 30, 1881.

FRIEND BENNETT: After so long a time I remit my dues for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I should hav done so ere this, but I couldn't get hold of the money. Inclosed find $5 for your paper and Paine's "Great Works, Complete," as published by yourself (I believe this is your offer). I want to get "The Champions of the Church" and "The Gods" as soon as I am able.

Well, so you are going to take that trip. Now I feel both glad and sorry about it; glad of the prospect of the feast in store for your readers, for you hav the happy faculty of making your readers see a thing with your own eyes, and sorry that you will be absent so long. But, on the whole, I think it will be a signal triumph for Freethought, and I for one would like for you (as it will likely be the only one you make) to take ample time and make a thorough tour of it, and I believe this will be the desire of your readers generally.

Now may Mother and Father Nature bless you and sustain you in this noble work for the enlightenment of mankind, is the earnest and heartfelt desire of your well-wisher, E. A. ROLEN.

Lament of Tamar.

BY ALHAZA.

Rich jessamins were twined among my curls,
But now defiled with dust and wet with mire;
Come, Absalom, if Israel boasts a man
Not drunk with lust or dark, unholy ire.

Wild, wondrous tales are told of heathen gods—
Osiris brought a wreath his love to charm;
But flowers grow black where Amnon wends his way,
With gag, strait-jacket, and a brawny arm.

Some bosoms thirst for beauty. I could dwell
Forever in a vale, with dance and song,
But every sobbing tree records my woe,
Where art thou, noble brother, bright and strong?

I track thy footsteps, dost thou wander now
In dank, wild cavern, and by poisonous fen;
With rue and night shade and each dismal tree,
Far from the shameful haunts of Israel's men?

The hungry falcon hovers near his prey,
And Amnon loves the ghastly harvest moon;
Wildly he clasped me at the vintage time,
And 'neath a terebinth he asked a boon.

With hatred glowing in his lurid eye,
"This is a wild, consuming dance of death;
And Absalom will lead thy footsteps far
Where wan miasma waits with fatal breath."

Then Amnon dragged me to a darksome grove,
Trembling with fear, he rudely vexed me so,
When a stern, holy spirit gliding near,
Whispered fierce words and bid him let me go.

So Hebrew women tread the dance of death,
And friends are few, and Amnons hover near,
And no religion comes with tender hand,
To sooth each grief and dry the falling tear.

A snowy brow beams through the cedar's gloom,
Bathed in the rose's breath, the citron's dew.
How white and cold beneath the harvest moon
Is Absalom, the brave, the kind, and true!

What's the News?

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

How do you do, my friend, to-day?
Your well I'm glad to hear you say,
And since you ask me, by the way,
What's the news, what's the news?

I'm glad I hav good news to tell,
For Mr. Jamieson and Bell
Hav knocked the bottom out of hell;
That's the news, that's the news.

Another thing, the devil's dead,
For Babcock's mashed him on the head,
And Comstock's took his place instead;
That's the news, that's the news.

Since Ingersoll has dealt out doses
To gods and ghosts and holy Moses,
They're all afraid to show their noses;
That's the news, that's the news.

And Chainey's kicked a church to bits;
He's giving to the clergy fits,
And men begin to use their wits;
That's the news, that's the news.

Friend Underwood and brother Green
With others hav gone forth to glean
In fields where there is naught obscene;
That's the news, that's the news.

One Bennett and a man called Seaver
Are wielding each a Freethought cleaver
And whacking at an old deceiver;
That's the news, that's the news.

The general public doubt the tale
About old Jonah and the whale;
Such fishy yarns are getting stale;
That's the news, that's the news.

Blind faith some men are bold to say
With church and priests will pass away
And common sense will win the day;
That's the news, that's the news.

In fields of knowledge that abound
No gods or heaven or hell is found;
This revelation priests confound;
That's the news, that's the news.

In science there's a revolution;
Its wise men show the true solution
Of all there is in evolution;
That's the news, that's the news.

The church the truths of science hates
Because it now does boldly state
No power is found that can create;
That's the news, that's the news.

The loss of heaven men don't regret;
If hell is gone they will not fret;
Best neither hav than both, you bet;
That's the news, that's the news.

And all who to this truth agree
That there's no endless misery
Are happy now as they can be
That's the news, that's the news.

"AS THE inevitable break-up of the old order comes, as the English middle class slowly awaken from its intellectual sleep of two centuries, as our actual present world, to which this condemned us shows itself more clearly, our world of an aristocracy materialized and null, a middle class purblind and hideous, a lower class crude and brutal, we shall turn our eyes again, and to more purpose, upon this passionate and dauntless soldier of a forlorn hope, who, ignorant of the future and unconsoled by its promises, nevertheless waged against the conservation of the old impossible world to fiery battle, waged it till he fell, waged it with splendid and imperishable excellence of sincerity and strength."—Poetry of Byron, by Matthew Arnold.

LIFE OF VOLTAIRE.

BY JAMES PARTON.

With Portraits and other Illustrations.

This work, which has occupied Mr. Parton many years in its preparation, is now ready. It is in two large volumes, on heavy paper, and printed in bold, clear type.

Mr. Parton as a historian and biographer has no superior, as his biographies of Jackson, Franklin, Jefferson, Greeley, Burr, and Butler prove, and his great ability is even more manifest in this work. It is a labor of love, as well as a monument of research and scholarship. It is just, candid, discriminating, and exact, describing Voltaire as he was, a transcendent philosopher, a great reformer, a brilliant wit and poet, and setting forth what faults he had as a man. It is the first truthful and thorough biography Voltaire has had in the English language. It is a most interesting portraiture of a truly remarkable man, whether he is viewed as the champion of Liberalism, a powerful and persevering foe to bigotry, or as the fertil scholar of every branch of literature and advocate always and everywhere of tolerance and liberty. It is the arsenal from which Liberals will draw weapons to refute the slanders and lies of the church about Voltaire, and Mr. Parton's reputation will make it the authority in regard to his life, his work, his death.

In two vols. 8vo. Price, $6; half calf, $11.

REPLIES TO THE

"Christian Guardian" and "Christian Advocate."

By ALLEN PRINGLE.

This pamphlet was considered necessary because the paper attacking Mr. Pringle refused to publish his reply to it. Its criticism was upon Mr. Pringle's argument against design in nature, and this work contains both the attack and reply. It is valuable, as it presents the strongest Christian evidence for the existence of God with the complete and overwhelming refutation.

PLAIN HOME TALK,

EMBRACING

Medical Common Sense.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M.D.

This book is a plain talk about the human system, the habits of men and women, the causes and prevention of disease, our sexual relations and social natures. It is medical common sense applied to causes, prevention, and cure of chronic diseases, the natural relations of men and women to each other, society, love, marriage, parentage, etc. Embellished with two hundred illustrations. A BUSINESS MAN'S RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL VIEWS.

12mo, 206pp. Price, $1.

The author's conception of future life on earth is really eloquent and beautiful, and will enlist attention. A curiosity to see what a philanthropic business man has to say upon the social problem from a poor man's standpoint will doubtless alone induce many to buy the book. The bold and trenchant blows which he deals "society" in all its ramifications of corruption and inhumanity; his earnest and manly plea for the social regeneration of the lower classes—will, unless we are much mistaken, make the book the best-abused and best-liked production of the day by these two classes respectivly.—Critical Review.

He blames Dr. Hitchcock that the latter perceives a huge human misery, but neither sees nor seeks any other solution than that the weakest must go to the wall. It is against this passivness that "Socialist" cries out. Is there no help for the miserable? he asks. The doctrin that government should merely "protect" he attacks, and insists that he should "assist" also. While he does not believe that property is robbery, or wholly subscribe to "the world owes me a living," he affirms "the world owes me a chance to make a living."—New York Herald.

SUPERSTITION IN ALL AGES.

BY JOHN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO MISS ANNA KNOOP, Dear Madam:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

"At last we have seen and examined the famous 'Comstock' syringe. It is a marvel of simplicity of construction; seems admirably adapted to the end had in view in its invention and manufacture, and should be in the possession of every woman. The self-appointed inquisitors of the church have set out to suppress it in the interest of those who prey upon the misfortunes of their fellows. Cleanliness is essential to health, and health interferes with the profits of certain well-known classes."—Liberal Free Press, (Davenport, Iowa) Nov. 6, 1880.

"We have seen the famous Comstock Syringe, so named because Anthony Comstock, that champion agent of the Y. M. C. A., charged upon it and its inventor and proprietor, much in the way as that renowned champion, Don Quixote, did upon the windmill, and got hurt for his pains. The Comstock Syringe surpassed all our expectations. We did not expect to see an instrument so different to anything we had ever seen before—so unique, and in every way adapted for the purposes recommended by the doctor. By the ladies it must be considered a real blessing, not in disguise. It is the prince of all syringes."—Dr. Kinget's Health Journal, New York, (317 East 14th Street,) October, 1880.

"Any reflective reader must perceive the practicability of your celebrated cleanser, and the urgent need of its universal use for the welfare of womankind."—Dr. A. OPPERMANN, St. Joseph, Mo.

"That 'Comstock' Syringe has proven itself all right and stood the test of time. My wife's health has greatly improved since she commenced using it."—EZRA T. DANIELS, Downs, Kan.

"I have just received that warmly-welcomed little friend to woman. I think it one of the best inventions of the age."—Mrs. M. S. TOWNSEND WOOD, West Newton, Mass.

"I am more than pleased with the Syringe. I can readily see that it must prove one of the greatest blessings to womankind; but it seems a real pity that such an innocent and indispensable little article should bear the infamous name of 'Comstock.'"—Mrs. YOUNG DENNIS, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

"The majority of doctors who depend upon the misfortunes of others for subsistence will set their faces against your 'Comstock' contrivance."—D. HIGBIE, M. D., Burton, Mich.

"I hope you will push your 'Comstock' Syringe until it is known to every family in the Union, when its great benefit to overtasked and suffering women will be appreciated."—A. L. RAWSON, M. D., L. L. D.

"I think it is the best article of the kind I ever saw."—EDWIN BARLOW, D. M., Flushing, Mich.

"We have critically examined the 'Comstock' Syringe (so-called) and professionally pronounce it the most admirably adapted article for the prescribed purpose that we have ever seen. It should be in the possession of every woman in the land."—Dr. NORMAN MACLEOD, Dr. JOHN MACCRIMMON, Dr. A. E. MORRIS, Dr. E. A. MANNSEL, Prof. DELOSS LUCE, Dr. E. ATWELL, Dr. A. J. DEAL, all of Chicago, Ills.

"I received that wonderful Syringe, and consider it the type of health and purity. I want to shake hands with you and tender my heartfelt thanks for such a supreme blessing."—MARY E. BARLOW, Lincoln, New Mexico.

"Your Syringe is all that it is claimed to be."—HATTIE SANTY, Cottonwood, Kan.

"Anthony Comstock has at last been of some service to humanity in calling public attention to such a blessing as your Syringe."—J. W. KINSKERN, Sanford, Broome Co., N. Y.

"I can truly say that I am more than pleased with the Syringe received. I am proud of it. It far surpasses my expectation. All women ought to be thankful for such a god-send to their sex. I would not have begrudged the purchase price had it been $50."—Mrs. W. H. WILLIAMS, Ottawa, Kan.

"I think it meets all the demands of woman for such an article. It is certainly the best Syringe I have ever seen." —JAMES M. BUNN, New Washington, Pa.

"I consider this "Comstock" Syringe the prince of all others for cleansing and healthful purposes, and for applying local remedies. I never felt more like rejoicing in my life than I do now over my returning health since the commencement of its use."—Mrs. H. F. Phillips, Algonquin, Ill.

IMPORTANT TO THE INVALIDS OF AMERICA.

It is a fact well known to every individual in this country that all new inventions hav been opposed by the very class of men who should make inquiry respecting the same. For instance, Fulton with his steamboat, and Stephenson with his locomotiv.
Then we had legislators in our Congress who looked upon Morse as a lunatic when he asked for a short line of telegraph between Baltimore and Washington. Yet to-day what should we do without our telegraph or steamboat and locomotiv?

THE INVENTORS OF ALL THESE THINGS HAV HAD TO BEAR THE INSULTS OF ALL SO-CALLED SCIENTISTS. WHY, EVEN SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, ONE OF THE GREATEST CHEMISTS THAT EVER LIVED—HE WITH ALL HIS LEARNING PROVED HIMSELF A FOOL WHEN HE RIDICULED THE IDEA OF LIGHTING OUR STREETS WITH GAS. HE SAID IT WAS AN IMPOSSIBILITY TO SO USE COAL GAS.

What to-day should we do without such a medium of light? Our sewing-machines—they were also opposed by those whose interest it was to oppose them. Thousands of instances may be quoted where articles now in daily use were ridiculed by the people whose interest it was to keep back the introduction of such inventions.

Now, then, as to the WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING.

THIS INVENTION IS AS NEW TO THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOOLYN AS WAS THE FIRST INTRODUCTION OF STEAM-ENGINS AND ELECTRIC TELEGRAPHS, AND YET THE PEOPLE, ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, HAV NO MORE SENSE THAN TO ASK THEIR PHYSICIANS WHETHER OR NOT THEY SHALL WEAR WILSONIA GARMENTS. IT IS JUST AS REASONABLE TO ASK A COMMON TINKER TO MAKE YOU A GOLD WATCH, OR AN IDIOT TO SOLVE A MATHEMATICAL PROBLEM, AS TO ASK PRACTICING PHYSICIANS THEIR OPINION AS TO THE VALUE OF THE WILSONIA MAGNETIC CLOTHING. AND YET THIS INVENTION IS DESTINED TO OVERTHROW ALL FORMER METHODS OF TREATING DISEASE, AND OUR CHILDREN WILL WONDER HOW THEIR PARENTS COULD HAV BEEN SO HUMBUGGED AS TO POISON THEMSELVS WITH NOXIOUS DRUGS. PHYSICIANS THEMSELVS WHO HAV ADVANCED IN LIFE KNOW VERY WELL THAT MEDICIN IS A MISTAKE.

We hav in Brooklyn cases of diseases cured that hav been given over by the very best physicians, so called, in the city of Brooklyn. In the testimonies given below you hav the names of five Brooklyn physicians who had given over the patient to die.
Read these testimonials and then let these physicians answer why they fail to cure. Read Dr. Mansfield's evidence; also the evidence of Peter Lehlback, of Jersey City, whom fifty physicians of New Jersey and New York gave over as incurable. Let these doctors explain why they failed to cure after four years of medical practicc, costing that poor man $15,000. And yet the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS, which they dared condemn, are all sufficient to cure in two months.

I WILL GIV ANY PHYSICIAN IN BROOKLYN $5,000 IF HE CAN DISPROVE ALL I SAY IN REFERENCE TO THE VALUE OF THE "WILSONIA" SYSTEM IN TREATING DISEASE, AND WILL ALSO UNDERTAKE TO CURE NINE-TENTHS OF ALL HIS INCURABLES, FREE OF CHARGE, PROVIDED HE REGISTERS THE NAMES OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME.

I will also giv any patient $5,000 who has worn my goods in quantity and time as I direct and has not received all the benefit I promised.

Read the following among the many testimonies given as to the virtues of the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC CLOTHING:

HÆMATEMESIS.

(Bleeding from mucous membrane of Throat and Stomach.)

This almost seems incredible. But, nevertheless, this patient has come under the personal observation of Dr. Thayer, as well as all the others who have addressed their letters to him, and he affirms the truth of all they claim.

BROOKLYN, April 30, 1881.

DR. THAYER, My Dear Sir: I was first taken sick about the 15th of February, 1880. My first attack was like this: I coughed up two or three mouthfulls of blood, when I called a physician, who prescribed for hemorrhage from the lungs. I recovered slightly. Three weeks after I was awakened in the night with a cough, finding my mouth full of blood. Continued to spit blood for two days before it could be controled, which left me very weak. Recovered just enough to get around again in a very weakened condition.
Whenever I would stoop to pick up anything the blood would come up into my mouth.
Drs. Shirwell and McEvette both declared that I could never recover again. From July, 1880, to September 29, 1880, I was occasionally spitting up blood. Was suddenly taken sick one night while in the street. This attack of bleeding continued for twenty-four days. Spitting? No; I should better describe it by saying vomiting up blood with every cough. Dr. Sheppard was called in and said it was not possible for me to liv till spring—that I shouldn't live till April, 1881. Dr. Dower said he had done for me all he could. Dr. Carreau said one of my lungs was gone—THAT I COULD NOT RECOVER.
Early in March, 1881, I gave up the doctors in disgust. Upon the 21st of March, 1881, the "WILSONIA" appliances were put on me while I was in bed, as I was too weak to leave the same. Four days before this time, I—also my friends—thought I was dying.
Upon the 26th of March, 1881, I felt strong enough to get up and dress myself for the first time in three months. Then upon April 8, 1881, I was strong enough to ride two miles and call upon Mr. Wilson.
Now, three weeks since that time, I feel strong enough to WALK THAT DISTANCE. I have had no HEMORRHAGES since I put on the Appliances, and feel my strength growing better and better each day; in fine, I feel stronger and better than I have since I was first taken sick. Yours respectfully,
MICHAEL MARRION,
458 Third avenue, Brooklyn.

DR. THAYER, Dear Sir: It was about eighteen years ago that I was first attacked with sciatica, which developed into chronic rheumatism. I hav employed allopathy, homeopathy, electricity, and, in fact, ALL PATHYS. Hav employed the best medical skill in Brooklyn and Troy, New York, but they never cured me.
I commenced to wear the "WILSONIA" just before the holidays [but had no faith in them], with this result: I am stronger, sleep better, hav a better appetite, have increased in flesh and weight, feel better, AM BETTER. Have slept on hop pillows, and done almost everything for my previous nervous prostration, all of which I hav no need for now since wearing the "WILSONIA" Garments. Yours truly,
MRS. JANE SCOTT,
332 Clinton street, Brooklyn.

We place our Electro Magnetic Appliance on the body, and we succeed in influencing the internal organs, tissues, fluids, etc., by acting directly on the arterial blood, which absorbs a due amount of the magnetic force, thus invigorating the whole system, there being no cell or tissue unpenetrated by the blood. It is impossible to estimate the number of persons who lose their life from a neglect of the conditions necessary for its preservation.

NASAL CATARRH AND OBESITY.

BROOKLYN, May 30, 1881.

PROFESSOR WILSON, Dear Sir: All my life long I hav sufferred from nasal catarrh. Three months ago you persuaded me to wear your Magnetic Clothing. The offensiv disease is nearly eradicated, and I can read aloud, sing, or go up and down stairs with comparativ ease—something I hav not done in years without weariness. I was also annoyed with an excess of fat. Much of this has abated, and I hav gained a proportionate degree of muscular strength I measure over three inches less around the body—below the waist—since wearing your Garments.
I supposed that during the warm weather they would be burdensome. On the contrary, I am as comfortable as the present oppressiv heat will permit any one to be in ordinary dress. MRS. E. G. CHIPMAN,
7 Bond street.

WONDERFUL CURE OF PARALYSIS AND APOPLEXY.

[CASE OF PROFESSOR HATCH SMITH.]

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Feb. 28.

DEAR SIR: The "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS with which you invested me on the 22d day of November, ultimo, hav proved to be all that you claimed for them. I was stricken with apoplexy, and one-half (the right side) paralyzed on the third day of May last. In September following I stopped taking medicins. The results due to the "WILSONIA" GARMENTS as shown by my present physical condition are alike a wonder and a pleasure—the former to my friends, the latter to myself. You are indeed a favored mortal to be a chosen instrument to cure the sick by a natural law, as simple and beautiful as it is certain and perfect. Be assured that in giving you this statement I am actuated by a desire to lead all to seek your aid who suffer from a similar disease. I now know that your startling declaration, "One disease, one remedy," is absolutely true. This may puzzle some of my intimate friends, who are noble craftsmen on the medical staff; but they hav got to admit it. Wonderful facts cease to astound after a caustic dose of familiarity. It is a question of time alone for mankind to adopt "WILSONIA" in lieu of doctors and drugs. Your humble and obedient servant,
C. HATCH SMITH.

SUPPRESSED SCARLET FEVER.—SAVED FROM IMMINENT DEATH

DEAR SIR: Some two weeks since I read in the Brooklyn News a reporter's item noting a remarkable result from an application of your "WILSONIA" garments in the cases of suppressed scarlet fever. Having known of a case where a young man threatened with pneumonia was really cured in forty-eight hours by putting on your nerve and lung invigorator and the four other appliances which go with it ordinarily, I was curious to trace this fever case and see if any allowance must be made for the reporter's fancy. The scarlet fever patient was a six-year-old granddaughter of Mr. David Collier, on Columbia street, and I called upon him regarding it. He said the reporter's item was substantially correct. He said his family physician, Dr. Moffat, the homeopathist, acted as every humane physician does when, having no hope of recovery himself he says to the parents and friends, "We must hope for the best." Being told by the doctor that the "WILSONIA" garments would not interfere with his medicins, Mr. Collier extemporized a nerve and lung invigorator from two leg belts which he took off his own person, and applied them as best he could upon his dying granddaughter. In about two hours from the time he put them on the doctor called, and on examining the child, remarked that a gentle perspiration had come on, and warmly congratulated the family and friends on the result. I found in this case, as I should find, doubtless, in every other, a delicacy of feeling in the family, touching their family physician; a reluctance to say much in special praise of a remedy that was not administered or recommended by the doctor. I was satisfied, however, that those most interested considered that the saving of the little patient was due to the "WILSONIA," and I am constrained here to act upon the conviction that duty to the great public demands that this acknowledgment be publicly given.
Desirous of knowing what Dr. Moffat himself would say of the case, I visited his residence and had a prolonged interview. Among other things he said: "The patient was in a precarious condition. We could not bring on diaphoresis, but a gentle perspiration set in after the goods had been upon her two hours, and she continued to grow better gradually as long as they were on her." Very naturally he put in some saving clauses for the reputation and dignity of the faculty. "There was," he said, "no phenomenal change," and he "would want to see the same results in repeated cases before he could declare in its favor unreservedly." It occurred to me, Mr. WILSON, when he remarked about such a wonderful result, that "there was no phenomenal change," he paid about as high compliment to the "WILSONIA" system as could well be given, and believing, yes, knowing as well as I do that mothers and nurses everywhere should be made acquainted with the fact that in the "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS they hav a sure reliance in those frequently recurring, and if not broken up, fatal cases of suppressed fever, I am induced to write you this. You may make what use of it you choose. It is from one in whom suffering humanity has a FRIEND.

THE FAR-FAMED "WILSONIA."

moves grandly on, conquering and to conquer every form of disease known to men. It triumphs over even the most complicated forms within the short space of ten or twelve months. Read the following glowing tribute from the ready pen of the world-renowned Dr. Mansfield, of New York. It was received to-day:

61 WEST FORTY-SECOND STREET, N. Y., April 9, 1881.

DEAR WILSON: I am pleased to inform you that I am quite well from the use of your appliances. Fifteen days since I could not walk more than a quarter of a mile without resting. To-day I can walk three miles without fatiguing me in the least. I only wish that those who suffer as I did could know the efficacy of the "WILSONIA" as I do.
Mrs. Mansfield has been and now is under the care of a celebrated physician, and up to yesterday has been suffering from debility attended with much pain. Last evening I proposed to take my magnetic suit and put it upon her. She consented, and had not it upon her body over ten minutes before she acknowledged she was free from pain. She slept well all night, without experiencing the slightest pain whatever. I regret I hav not two suits, but I will put mine on her again to-night. I dare not go without it myself during the day time. Several ladies hav called on Mrs. M. this morning, and her theme is the "WILSONIA."
I hav sent your representativ on Broadway several customers already, and in every case I tell them you MUST DRESS them as YOU DEEM prudent. I hav two more on the "anxious seat" that will be converted soon. I hope to send you a $1,000 worth of customers this year.
God bless you, dear WILSON, for what you hav done and are doing for suffering humanity.
Respectfully, J. V. MANSFIELD.

ASTOUNDING CURE OF PARALYSIS.

(The patient taken off from crutches.)

JERSEY CITY, March 11.

MR. WM. WILSON, Dear Sir: I hereby wish to acknowledge the great merit of your Magnetic Appliances. I hav been greatly afflicted with paralysis and rheumatism for more than two years, unable to leave my bed, and had to be carried wherever I wished to go. I was attended by more than fifty of the most prominent physicians of Jersey City and New York, at the Hudson County Church Hospital and at my residence, 548 Jersey avenue, and I never got any relief until I applied the great "WILSONIA" MAGNETIC GARMENTS. I hav worn them now for about two months, and am able to walk about and attend to my business, and am improving daily. My present residence is 551 Jersey avenue, where all the afflicted who call may be informed of the merit of your goods, which I commend most earnestly to unfortunates afflicted as I hav been. PETER A. LEHLBACK.

MY DIFFICULTY IS THAT MANY PERSONS WILL BECOME ROTTEN WITH DISEASE, WILL SWALLOW MEDICIN ENOUGH TO FLOAT A STEAMSHIP, AND RUB IN LINIMENTS AND OINTMENTS ENOUGH TO TAN THE SKIN TILL IT BECOMES LIKE THE SAIL OF A SHIP; AND THEN, HEARING OF MY MARVELOUS CURES, WILL EXPECT, ON PUTTING ON MY GOODS, TO JUMP INTO NEW LIFE IN TWO OR THREE MONTHS. THIS IN MOST CASES IS AN IMPOSSIBILITY, AND PERSONS GOVERNED BY SUCH EXPECTATIONS HAD BETTER NOT WASTE THEIR TIME OR MY OWN IN CALLING UPON ME.

FRIENDS OF THE SICK POOR OF BROOKLYN,

Enforce your physicians and the Charity Commissioners of Brooklyn to accept my offer to them in your behalf.
I renew it here as follows:

THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN ARE AGAIN OFFERED $5,000 WORTH OF MY GOODS, FREE OF CHARGE, TO BE PLACED UPON THEIR SICK POOR IN THE HOSPITALS OF BROOKLYN; AND I ALSO WILL GIV $5,000 CASH TO ANY INSTITUTION WHERE MY GOODS ARE ACCEPTED IF I DO NOT ABSOLUTELY CURE NINE-TENTHS OF THE PATIENTS HANDED OVER TO ME. AND, BE IT REMEMBERED, I ONLY ASK SUCH CASES AS HAV BEEN GIVEN OVER AS INCURABLE BY THE PHYSICIANS OF BROOKLYN. THE LIMIT OF TIME TO EFFECT A CURE SHALL BE TWELVE MONTHS FROM THE DATE OF TIME OF PUTTING ON THE GOODS.

MULTIFORM DISEASE CLASSIFIED,

And the range of price for the "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits warranted to effect a cure in every case, when the suit is worn continuously for the space of twelve months—frequently will do this in half that time.

All forms of PULMONARY DISEASE, such as Phthisis Pulmonalis, or Consumption, Bronchial Hemorrhage, Pulmonary Hemorrhage, Croupous Pneumonia, Catarrhal Pneumonia, Induration, or Hardening of the Lung, Bronchial Asthma, Tussis Convulsiver, or Whooping Cough, Inflammation of the Pleura, or Pleurisy, Hydro-Thorax, or Water in the Chest, Pneumo-Thorax, or Air in the Chest, Epitaxis, or Bleeding from the Nose.
The above forms of disease require "Wilsonia" Magnetic suits which aggregate in cost from $38.50 to $73.50, according to the precise character of the disease and condition of the patient. These same conditions govern or determin the quantity of goods and their aggregate cost in every case mentioned in the following classes:
All forms of Cardiac, or HEART DISEASE, require magnetic suits ranging in price from $38.50 to $73.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of DIGESTION, such as Diphtheritic Inflammation of the Pharynx, Syphilitic Affections of the Pharynx, Inflammation of the Œsophagus, Stricture of the Œsophagus, Acute Gastric Catarrh, or Acute Catarrh of the Stomach, Gastritis, or Inflammation of the Stomach, Carcinoma, or Cancer of the Stomach, Hematomesis, or Hemorrhage of the Stomach, Dyspepsia, Scrofulous and Tuberculous Diseases of the Intestins and Mesenteric Glands, Colic, Gastric Fever, Neuralgia of the Stomach and Intestins, Peritonitis.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $93.50.
All forms of Disease of the Liver and Bile-Ducts, such as Hyperemia, or Enlargement of the Liver, Acute Yellow Atrophy of the Liver, Tuberculosis of the Liver, Cirrhosis of the Liver, Acute and Chronic Hepatitis, or Acute and Chronic Inflammation of the Liver, Fatty Liver, Cancer of the Liver, etc.
The above require suits costing from $38.50 to $83.50.
All forms of disease of the kidneys, such as Hemorrhage of the Kidneys, Acute Bright's Disease, Parenchymatous, or Chronic Bright's Disease, Carcinoma, or Cancer of the Kidneys, Renal Calculus, or Stones in the Kidneys, Hematuria Vesicalis, or Hemorrhage of the Bladder, Incontinence of Urine and all diseases of the Sexual organs, Ovaritis, or Inflammation of the Ovary, Ovarian Tumor, Catarrh of the Uterus, Displacement of the Uterus, Parenchymatous Metritis, or Acute Inflammation of the Uterus, Tumors of the Uterus, Anomalis, or Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Catarrh of the Vagina, Leucharrh.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $108.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the NERVOUS SYSTEM, such as Softening of the Brain, Hemaphlega, or Paralysis of the Lateral Halves of the Body, Pariphlegia, or Paralysis of the Upper or Lower Half of the Body, Paralysis Agitans, or Shaking Palsy, Apoplexy, Cerebral Hemorrhage, Cerebritis, or Inflamation of the Brain, Cerebro-Spinal Meningitis, Sclerosis of the Brain, Hydrocephalus Acquisitus, or Water on the Brain Acquired, Hydrocephalus Congenitus, or Water on the Brain from Birth, Myelitis, or Inflammation of the Spinal Marrow, Hemorrhage of the Spinal Cord, or Spinal Apoplexy, Tabes Dorsualis, or Consumption of the Spinal Cord, Locomotor Ataxia, or Progressiv Grey Degeneration of the Posterior Columns of the Spinal Cord, Tiedouloureux, Neuralgia, Neuralgia Ischia Dica, or Sciatica, Chorea, or St. Vitus' Dance, Trismus, or Lock-jaw, Epilepsy, or Falling Sickness, Eclampsia Infantum, Hysteria, Catalepsy, Hypochondriasis.
The above require suits costing from $48.50 to $150.00.
All forms of DISEASE of the SKIN, such as Eczema and its several varieties, require suits costing from $48.50 to $73.50.
All forms of DISEASE of the ORGANS of LOCOMOTION, such as Rheumarthrisis Acute, or Flying Gout, Acute Articular Rheumatism, Chronic Articular Rheumatism, Deformities of the Joints, Gout, Progressiv Muscular Atrophy.
The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $200.00.
All forms of ACUTE and CHRONIC INFECTIOUS DISEASE, such as Measles, Scarlet Fever, Small Pox, Chicken Pox, Typhus Fever, Typhoid Fever, Relapsing Fever, Intermittent Fever, Dysentery, Syphilis, Congenital and Hereditary.
The above require magnetic suits costing $93.00.
All DISORDERS OF NUTRITION which do not depend upon Infection, such as Chlorisis, Scrofula, Diabetes (both varieties), Scarbutus, or Scurvy, etc.

The above require magnetic suits costing from $48.50 to $68.50.
HERNIA requires Magnetic Appliances costing from $53.50 to $93.50.
VARICOSE VEINS require Magnetic Appliances costing from $58.50 to $108.50.

N. B.—When "Wilsonia" Magnetic Suits are ordered to be forwarded by mail or express [they should go by express wherever practicable], do not neglect to state the size of head, of the waist, the wrist, and length of the foot of the person for whom they are ordered. All checks and post-office orders should be made payable to William Wilson, 465 Fulton street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

CONSULT

Your Case is Curable!

You must Not Despair!

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.
Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES, SPERMATORRHŒA, and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defectiv Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an External Application, which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselvs.
Syphilis positivly cured and entirely eradicated from the system. Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Stricture, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.
All diseases of women—such as Amenorrhœa (or delay of the first menses), Dysmenorrhœa (or laborious menstruation), Chlorosis (or green sickness), Leucorrhœa (or whites), Prolapsus Uteri (or falling womb), etc.—treated with equal success, as the following will show:
"DEAR DOCTOR: If the kind thought shafts I daily send you are received, I will not need to tell you that I am feeling better than for seven years, nor express my gratitude in words. If every kind and grateful thought I send you were a blossom, you would be a pyramid of flowers."
The above lines, from Annie E. Edwards, of Alliance, O., is only a sample of the many grateful expressions received by the Doctor from suffering women whose diseases peculiar to their sex hav made their lives so miserable, and who receive so little sympathy from members of their own households.

A GREAT DOCTOR.

Kersey Graves the noted author and lecturer, writing to the Seymour, Ind., Times under the above head, remarks: "There is perhaps no art that can claim the attention of the human mind of more importance than alleviating human suffering, stopping the progress of disease, and thus extending the period of human life. And I know of no physician more successful in the practice of this art than Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His success in nearly all forms of chronic diseases seems to be absolutely wonderful. He seems to hav no use for the word "fail" in his practice. This I know by actual trial, having been relieved of a bad case of kidney disease by his new method when all other means failed. Try him, by all means, if you are afflicted with any of the maladies incident to this age. I deem it my duty to say this much for the benefit of suffering humanity."
Dr. Fellows will send for two 3-cent stamps his MEDICAL ADVISER; or, NEW GUIDE TO HEALTH, setting forth a new and scientific method (never before known) for the cure of all chronic diseases. Also, for the same number of stamps, his PRIVATE COUNSELOR, treating on Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, giving the cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, which consists of the External Remedy spoken of above. No medicin taken.
Consultation in person, $5.00; by letter, free and invited, which are kept strictly confidential in all cases. Charges for treatment reasonable. Address Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,
Vineland, N. J.

Col. Ingersoll's Works.

"Some Mistakes of Moses."

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 273 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Gems of Thought.

WHAT is false can never be the best rule or principle of action, or the best thing for us to endure when it can be easily avoided. Grant to Catholics every demand they make in the name of the Roman Catholic church and how soon would they hav the whole world under control of the pope. Grant to Christianity her every demand, and God and Christ would be in the Constitution and every progressiv reform nipped in the bud. So if Infidelity does no other good it keeps the church in check and forces her to be far more liberal, just, and charitable than it is in her nature to be.—Elmina D. Slenker.

LET Grimalkin arise, and put on her beautiful garments, for the genius of Mr. Geo Mivart has dawned upon the universe, and he asserts that the vital principle of animals, the cat, for instance, has nothing very special to do with pussy herself, but the imposing fact that she livs, purrs, and catches mice is due to an irresistible force from God or power floating through space, which has a way of rushing into crannies, and attending to all sorts or business, snubbing or insulting a cat or man by intruding into his department of labor, into his work-shop, parlor, or kitchen, while even his heart and brain are not safe from such annoyance. If our velvet friend has been catching mice since the flood she must imagin that she has been doing that little on her own hook, without the help of God or angels, unless they are like hounds, which drive the prey into her clutches. Says Mivart, "The cat became what she is by virtue of an internal principle, or law of God, working and unfolding in a systematic manner," and all this is so neatly done, that certainly it would take a God to do it. But what an astounding capacity a cat must possess (if enough of her is left intact to possess anything) even in her very kittenhood, to be able to receive and apply practically all the gentle hints, nods, and little pushes, given by the best of deities, which she is obeying all the while she is performing her silken bounds into the air, or managing her feline housekeeping in the back-yard or on the fence. Mr. Mivart detests Atheism, but he knows that capacity for improvement amounts to the same thing as talent, in cat, man, or rhizopod. If pussy's capacity for progress emanated from God it follows that this deity condescends to act the role of the cat himself, which outdoes Vishnu, who has, I suppose, been incarnated only nine hundred and ninety-nine times. A rhizopod improvises one foot when he wishes to walk, no thanks to the Holy Ghost, for I should never think of referring such an exploit to God, in any shape or way, as he might not like such a stain of humility upon his holy escutcheon, where some few bars sinister hav perhaps appeared. If the tolerably respectable shadow in question does anything it must be calling into being myriads of feeble creatures and destroying many of them in the most painful manner before they hav tasted the pleasures of their fleeting existence.—Alhaza.

WE may lay it down as an incontestable axiom that, in all the operations of art and nature, nothing is created; an equal quantity of matter existed both before and after the experiment. The quality and quantity of the elements remain precisely the same and nothing takes place beyond changes and modifications in the combinations of the elements. Upon this principle the whole art of performing chemical experiments depends. We must always suppose an exact equality between the elements of the body examined and those of the products of its analysis.—Lavoisier [1743-1794; guillotined!].

WHAT becomes of the coal when it is burned? Heat comes out of it, light comes out of it, and if we could gather together all that goes up the chimney and all that remains in the grate of a thoroughly-burned coal-fire, we should find ourselvs in possession of a quantity of carbonic acid, water, ammonia, and mineral matters exactly equal in weight to the coal.—Huxley.

LET us hope that, before long, a boy of Irish Catholic parents may not be separated from the children of Protestant parents from the fear lest his faith and mind should be endangered by their learning together the mysteries of the multiplication table, and that in the German provinces of Russia a young girl of fourteen years old may not be kept twelve hours without food in order to compel her to embrace the orthodoxy of the Greek church. I trust the time is coming when in regard to moral and physical darkness the divine command will issue, "Let there be light and there was light."—Earl Russell.

IT is the current belief that Adam was made out of the earth somewhere in Asia, about six thousand years ago; that Eve was modeled from one of his ribs; and that the progeny of these two, having been reduced to the eight persons who were landed on the summit of Mount Ararat after a universal deluge, all the nations of the earth hav proceeded from these last, hav migrated to their present localities, and hav become converted into negroes, Australians, Mongolians, etc., within that time. Five-sixths of the public are taught this Adamic monogenism as if it was an established truth, and believe it. I do not; and I am not acquainted with any man of science, or duly instructed person, who does.—Huxley.

A MAN may as reasonably draw cuts for his tenets, regulate his persuasion by the cast of a die, as take it up for its novelty, or retain it because it had his first assent and he was never of another mind. Well-weighed reasons are to determin the judgment; these the mind should be always ready to hearken and submit to, and by their testimony and suffrage entertain or reject any tenet indifferently, whether it be a perfect stranger or an old acpuaintance.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

FREETHOUGHT rules by proof, not by authority. It has a generous patience with the understanding until evidence incites the assent. Progress can only walk in the footsteps of conviction. Assent without conviction is tyranny. To assent without conviction is servility, submission, and cowardice. Coercion in thought is not progress, but the discipline of priestcraft, and reduces to ignominious pulp the back-bone of the mind.—G. J. Holyoake.

NEBRASKA version: "She gaily seized the kerosene to stimulate the fire, and the tenor who had loved her, at the funeral led the choir."

A POET has written a poem on the stopping of his clock. It came to him, perhaps, as a melancholy reminder that he could get nothing more on tick.

WHEN an illiterate farmer was asked by the prosecuting attorney if he was a husbandman, he replied, "No, but I am to be married next month, and then I shall be."

TEACHER: "Did I not tell you to be prepared with your history lesson? And here you are, unable to repeat a word of it." Scholar: "I didn't think it was necessary, sir; I've always heard that history repeats itself."
